I do not look with favor upon such legislation, as it creates artificial and unnatural relations in our intercourse with foreign nations, excites distrust and jealousy. In our diplomatic relations I would put all foreign governments upon an equal footing, ask no favors, and form entangling alliances with none. It is claimed that protection has brought down prices in this country; as well might it be claimed that free trade in England has reduced prices in that country, for the decline has been equally as great there as in this country. So it can be demonstrated that protection has had nothing to do with falling prices. What, then, has brought it about? Invention, discovery, and the wonderful improvement in machinery. It is an indisputable fact that the greatest decline has taken place in those articles that are in part or altogether made by machinery. And what can not be made by machinery has declined very little.

Let us take the boot and shoe industry. Forty years ago the workman was contented to turn out five pairs of shoes and three of boots; now with the use of his machine he will turn out two hundred and fifty of the first and a somewhat smaller number of the latter. And so it is in every branch of mechanical industry where the work can be done with machinery. The great inventions of the century have increased the productive powers of man ten, twenty, yea, an hundred fold.

THE HOME MARKET.

This is what the manufacturer promised the farmer as compensation for the burdens imposed upon him by the protective policy. How have these promises been fulfilled? A little investigation will show how inadequate the home market has been; and that if the farmer had relied upon it exclusively a large portion of his crops would have rotted upon his hands. We will take cotton and wheat, the largest articles of export.

What are the facts as to a home market for these? The home demand takes less than one-third of the cotton, leaving the remainder to find a market abroad in competition with the cotton produced by the lowest paid labor on the globe. And as to wheat, the farmer and those of his family would consume an average of 190,000,000 bushels, estimating 5 bushels of consumption per capita and 40,000,000 for seed. All persons engaged in the protected industries, according to the above estimate, would consume only 7,500,000 bushels, leaving the wheat-growers dependent upon the foreign markets for more than a hundred million bushels of their surplus. And the same may be said as to corn, provisions, tobacco, etc. It will be seen from these facts that after seventy-two years of high protection the farmers are compelled to rely mainly upon the foreign demand for a market for their surplus.

But to go back to reciprocity treaties. What has been the result of the one made with the Hawaiian Islands? Has it lowered the cost of sugar to consumers on the Pacific Coast? Very little, if any. Importations last year amounted to $9,255,351, and if this amount had been subject to duty, as sugar from other countries, the revenue therefrom would have been $7,592,989. This sum was lost to the Treasury, without a compensating benefit to our citizens, as the foreign producers and importers pocketed the entire sum.

I quote from Henry A. Brown, ex-special Treasury agent:

> The Hawaiian reciprocity treaty of 1875 and 1876 was a commercial fraud upon the people of this country, and the results have been singularly disastrous to American interests at large. This treaty has cost the American people a loss of at least $70,314,537 in ten years. Our consumers and tax-payers are now annually swindled out of $15,000,000, in loss of duties and extra cost of sugar to enrich monopolists, and pay the penalty of grasping after "foreign-policy" shadows. Our imports from that country under the treaty, free of duty, for 1886, were $9,741,-924; dutiable, $63,183; quite a one-sided reciprocity. In the same year we exported to that country $3,115,899.

In the Forum for October, 1887, Hon. J. G. CARLISLE wrote:

> Commercial treaties, while they may be desirable under peculiar circumstances, are generally more favorable to one party than the other, and are therefore frequently unjust. Besides, they grant exclusive privileges and make improper and offensive discriminations against other friendly nations.

A shrewd protectionist, in a pamphlet falling under my notice, writes thus:

> It is clear that Great Britain could not make a reciprocity treaty with us, because, already being a free-trade nation, it has no customs duties to surrender to the United States in return for ours. France, Belgium, Germany, Russia, Austria, Spain, and Italy are so absolutely dependent upon their customs revenue for the support of their governments that it is impossible for them to make reciprocity treaties with us.

It will be noticed that the above are all manufacturing nations, and that they take almost the entire products of our farms that are exported; but in the opinion of this protectionist such countries would not buy our manufactured products to any considerable extent. Hence reciprocity with them would not be desirable. But the same writer proposes such treaties with Canada, Mexico, Central and South America, Holland, Japan, China, and the Dutch East Indies, all purely agricultural countries, none of which would take the products of our farmers; but, on the contrary, the farm products of the pauper laborers of these countries would be brought in direct competition with ours. Then I assume that such treaties have all been unfriendly to the interests of the farming classes, and entirely in the interest of manufactures and commerce, and should not be entered into.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The internal-revenue receipts reached their highest point in 1866, aggregating $309,226,813. Since that date the internal-revenue law has been modified and repealed as to many articles heretofore taxed; and for 1887 the receipts were $118,823,391, chiefly derived from alcoholic spirits and tobacco. Now, the protectionist would repeal the internal-revenue laws, thereby cutting off from the Treasury an amount equivalent to the annual surplus, leaving tariff taxes untouched. This policy would give to consumers free whisky, free tobacco and cigars, dear food, dear clothing and materials for shelter. Would it not be better to abandon the protection policy, except as an incident to revenue, at least as to the fraud upon the laborer, and relieve his necessaries from taxation, including tobacco?

THE SURPLUS

in the Treasury should be applied to the reduction of the public debt, and the consequent annual interest, now more than $40,000,000. The accumulation of taxes in the Treasury has retired from circulation more than one-third of our currency, causing a plethora in the Treasury, and depletion of the life-blood of commerce constantly threatens a business crisis. Turn the surplus into the channels of business, lower tariff taxes, and a revival of business will be seen at once. Our statesmen have ever regarded a large surplus revenue as unfriendly to public morals and dangerous to the business of the country. In 1832 Mr. Clay declared:

> I enter my protest against the preservation of existing duties in order to accumulate a surplus in the Treasury, for the purpose of subsequent distribution among the several States. If the revenues are to be distributed for use by the States in their public expenditure, I know of no principle in the Constitution that authorizes the Federal Government to become such a collector for the States, nor of any principle of safety or propriety which admits of the States becoming such recipients of gratuity from the General Government.

The taxing power is the highest reach of sovereignty, and should be exercised alone for the purpose of maintaining the sovereign authority of the State, and never for private ends. Justice Miller declared from the bench "that the power to tax was a power to destroy, and was only limited by the necessities of government." How guardedly, then, should this power be exercised, and never without an eye single to the preservation and well-being of government.

TRUSTS

are an invention of recent origin of capitalists to put up the price of products of the trust and commit extortion upon the masses. They are the outgrowth of monopoly and high-tariff taxation, and their recent successful efforts to raise and control the prices of certain imports subjected to high duties has aroused bitter opposition to such an abuse of power. And the sovereign power of the Government is invoked to expose their enormities and strip them of the power to do such great wrongs to consumers. Nine of the States are manufacturing and twenty-nine are agricultural, the nine manufacturing constitute the money-loaning and the twenty-nine the borrowing States.

The nine have gathered to themselves, through the use of the taxing power of the Government, the great bulk of the circulating capital of the country, and are using it to compel the tax-oppressed farmers of the West and South to pay tribute to them. It is estimated that the Western farmers alone have given mortgages to them to the extent of more than $1,200,000,000. The country needs and must have more currency, and I would replace with greenbacks every dollar of circulation surrendered by national banks until the entire national-bank circulation shall be canceled. France to-day is the most prosperous nation on the globe, and her circulation is the largest, being $45 per capita. Our active circulation is less than $15, and one-third as much is now locked up in the Treasury vaults.

Mr. Calhoun thought that $30 of circulation per capita was the smallest sum required for prosperous trade and commerce. For twenty-five years the masses of the people have had but little control of their Government, its powers having been largely concentrated in the hands of capitalists and the great corporations. The latter classes have very little respect for the Constitution when it interposes obstacles in the way of their aggrandizement. The millionaire regards the Government as an instrumentality to be used to put money into his pocket, whilst the strict constructionist, who has constantly looked to the interest of the masses, believes it to be the wisest device of man to protect right and restrain wrong. As commerce between the States is absolutely free, sound policy would dictate that all unnecessary restrictions upon trade with foreign countries should be removed.

is the easiest paid of all taxes, and I favor a graduated income tax on all incomes over $3,000. The small farmer, mechanic, or professional man owning a homestead or a small farm, when a partial failure of crops occur, finds it inconvenient to pay his taxes and leave him enough to live upon, but the bondholder may collect his hundred thousand of interest coupons and escape taxation entirely. Ours is perhaps the only great nation that has no income taxes.

Taxes of the leading governments.

Governments.	Customs.	Excise.	Income tax.
Great Britain	$95,000,000	$135,000,000	$50,000,000
France	63,000,000	190,000,000	90,000,000
Germany	46,000,000	88,000,000	.....
United States	217,000,000	118,000,000	.....

In addition to the above those governments have various other internal taxes.

It costs less in New England and Pennsylvania to spin and weave a pound of cotton into cloth than it does in old England, though the weekly earnings of our people are higher.

This statement is supported by a reference to the annual consumption of pounds of cotton by each hand employed in the industry in the leading countries.

Countries.	Hands employed.	Pounds cotton used.	Pounds consumed per hand employed.
United States	172,544	750,343,000	4,337
Great Britain	482,903	1,471,357,000	3,253

Amasa Walker thus writes on the boot and shoe industry:

There is a remarkable confirmation of the truth of these remarks in the history of the boot and shoe manufactures of the United States. They never asked for protection; never received any notice in all the conflicts for increased tariffs. The trade grew up naturally, steadily, and profitably from the first, increasing gradually with the growth of the country, until at the present time it is not only the largest, but one of the most profitable branches of manufacturing industry. In Massachusetts alone this manufacture extends to over $50,000,000 annually, and is by far the most advantageous branch of industry in the State.

Thus showing how an industry has flourished that was not dependent upon legislation for development and continual support. In 1810 Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, made a report in which he stated that manufactures of wool and leather, amongst other things, were exported beyond the imports; that the following industries were "firmly established:" Ore and manufactures of iron, manufactures of cotton, wool, and flax, paper, printing types, books, several manufactures of hemp, and a few others. An effort to get higher duties that year failed.

Hon. David A. Wells writes:

Again, we formerly imported large quantities of gunny cloth from India to be used for the baling of our cotton. No one a few years ago would have ever dreamed that we could successfully make this cloth in competition with the natives of India, who work for the very lowest wages that are regularly paid for the services of human beings anywhere on the globe's surface. And yet through our invention and use of machinery we have done it, and comparatively little of this cloth is now brought to this country, the Indian pauper being nowhere in competition with the American iron spindle and shuttle.

In a conversation with Hon. David A. Wells, Mr. John Roach said:

But my men work mainly by the piece, and have such an opportunity and incentive in so doing to augment their wages that they have invented and practice all manner of devices for economizing and perfecting their labor; so much so that foreign ship-builders who visit my yards are astonished at the amount and excellence of the work we are able to turn out in a given time; and we have thus been enabled to so far overcome the difference in wages that I really do not believe the Englishmen have at present more than 30 per cent. the advantage over us in the cost of their labor.

Wells replied:

Well, it seems to me, Mr. Roach, that in making this admission you give up your whole case as a protectionist; for the materials which you employ in constructing your own vessels are augmented in price to a greater extent than 30 per cent. by reason of the tariff, and if, through a remission of duties you could buy these materials as cheap in Delaware as upon the Clyde, you could still afford to pay your workmen the same wages and bid defiance to all foreign competition.

I really believe we could, I really believe we could—

Was the instant rejoinder—for what these protectionists give me with one hand they more than take away with the other.

George William Bond, of Boston, the highest authority on wool in this country, said:

That high duties on wool are now maintained as a bounty to States which raise comparatively a small part of the clip, for the rest do not require it. The oft-repeated claim that the United States should raise all the wool she consumes is folly. You ask at what point does any tariff on wool begin to affect the price of the domestic clip.

I should say at that point, which shuts us out from the competition of the world, so that we are restricted in the range of our manufactures. Our fine wools have always been higher, other things being equal, when we were able freely to import the wools of other countries at a low duty, or at no duty at all. When the tariff of 1857 was passed fine wools became virtually free, so that we went into full or nearly full competition with Europe. What was the effect? Wools advanced immediately in the markets of production abroad 25 to 33½ per cent., so that we got them no cheaper than before, and the prices of domestic wools advanced. Now this was an advantage to our manufactures, so that ours could well afford to pay the advanced prices. Reduced to gold, the average prices of wool have been lower under the tariff of 1867 than they were under that of 1857, and I believe that if wools were to be made free to-day there would be no material decline in the value of fine American wools.

Thus we see that by exacting a duty which shuts us out from competition in the world's markets we give our competitors the raw material enough lower to materially lessen the protection afforded by the duty on the manufactured article.

The Pittsburgh Post gives the following interesting facts and figures bearing upon the wool tariff, which are worthy of the thoughtful study of those who disturb their imaginations with dreams of woeful consequences to follow the repeal of the duties on wool:

1859—LOW TARIFF.

Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,631,340
Sheep in Ohio	3,586,767
Sheep in New York	2,617,855
Prices—fine	56 to 60 cents
Prices—medium	45 to 50 cents
Prices—coarse	40 to 42 cents

1887—HIGH TARIFF.

Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,094,323
Sheep in Ohio	4,562,913
Sheep in New York	1,579,866
Prices—fine	33 to 34 cents
Prices—medium	37 to 38 cents
Prices—coarse	33 to 35 cents

SOME OF THE RESULTS.

Decrease of sheep in three States after twenty years' high protection	552,060
Decrease in prices, fine wool	23 to 26 cents
Decrease in prices, medium wool	8 to 12 cents
Decrease in prices, coarse wool	7 cents

"The above figures as to the number of sheep are the figures of the United States census for 1860 and from the official reports of the Department of Agriculture for 1887.

"The figures as to prices are from a table in the Treasury report on wool (page 109), giving the prices of fine, medium, and coarse washed clothing fleece-wool in New York and Philadelphia from 1824 to 1887.

"In 1860 the tariff act of 1857 was operative. It admitted coarse carpet wools free of duty, that is, wools valued at less than 7 cents a pound. On all other wools the duty was 24 per cent. In 1867 this was superceded by a high tariff, imposing a duty of 10 and 12 cents per pound, and 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem on fine wools and 3 and 6 cents a pound on coarse. This act was amended in 1883 by a trifling reduction, cutting off the 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem addition to the specific duty per pound, with a change in the rate on coarse wools to 2½ and 5 cents.

"In 1860, with high prices and increasing flocks, the duty was only 24 per cent., with coarse wools on the free-list.

"In 1887, after twenty years of high protection, and with duties ranging from 43 to 54 per cent. on fine wools, and 24 to 27 on coarse varieties, we have decreasing flocks and dwindling prices.

"Will some one please explain the benefits of high protection to the Pennsylvania wool grower? It can not be done. We all know the wool tariff taxes the poor man on the necessaries and comforts of life. It adds to the cost of his clothing, his wife's and children's; it adds to the costs of the carpet on his floor and the blanket on his bed. There is not a workingman in Pittsburgh but has to bear the burden of this unnecessary, blundering, and cruel tax on everything he wears, from the stockings on his feet to the wool hat on his head.

"And all for what? To help perpetuate the trusts and monopolies that make millionaires at one end of the line and tramps and strikes at the other, with the accompaniment of imported pauper labor, on which precious good care is taken there shall be no tariff.

"Give our manufacturers free raw materials, and it will become to them the philosopher's stone, and in a few years they will be able to defy the competition of the world, and the farmer will be relieved of his greatest burden. Why is labor so discontented if protection is for its benefit? We have lived under it for twenty-five years and yet strikes and riots are on the increase, and all of these are in the protected or the monopolistic industries. The farm laborer and the country mechanic do not strike."

With all this discontent and uneasiness in the mining and manufacturing centers it is strange that the only remedy proposed by protectionists is to take from agriculture large numbers and put them in the manufacturing industries, where they will increase the surplus of manufactured products and thereby aggravate the evils of what is claimed to be over-production, but which is really a lack of proper distribution. Abandon this hot-house policy, leave capital to seek the best investments without the interference of the Government, and labor to find its most remunerative employment, and steadier occupation and more satisfactory wages will be established. [Applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. I move that the committee rise.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2614) to authorize the Batesville and Brinkley Railroad to build a bridge across the Black River, in Arkansas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SAWYER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5929) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across Staten Island Sound, to report it favorably, without amendment, and to ask that Order of Business 288, being Senate bill 1433, be indefinitely postponed, and that the House bill which I have just reported be substituted for it on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill (S.

1433) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, will be indefinitely postponed, and the bill just reported by the Senator from Wisconsin will take its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1148) to grant a right of way to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back adversely the joint resolution (S. R. 25) providing for the printing of 4,500 copies of Finley's Storm Track Charts of the North Atlantic Ocean. The committee find that the printing of this chart would cost over $8,000. It does not seem to be needed for any practical purpose. It is simply for the use of science. I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report adversely the joint resolution (S. R. 53) to print 4,000 copies of the report of Naval Constructor Philip Hichborn, on European dock-yards. The printing of this document would cost over $6,000. We have communicated with the Secretary of the Navy, who says he has some 500 or 600 copies on hand for distribution. The committee think it is not necessary to print it. I therefore move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report adversely the bill (S. 2633) to regulate signal-lights on sailing vessels at sea. The committee recognizes the necessity, and the very great necessity, of regulating signal-lights on sailing vessels at sea; but the Senate has already at this session passed a bill providing for a marine congress, and as it undoubtedly will pass the other House and become a law, matters of this kind should be referred to that congress rather than be acted upon by this. I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1187) for the relief of J. J. McAlmont, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1188) for the relief of the estate of W. W. Adams, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 326) for the relief of Mrs. Frances Marshall, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] and myself desire that the bill just reported be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1191) for the relief of the legal representatives of Mary H. Pike, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1190) for the relief of the estate of Joseph Fenno, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1025) for the erection of an equestrian statue of ex-President Zachary Taylor, reported a bill (S. 2787) for the erection of an equestrian statue of ex-President Zachary Taylor, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2802) to fix the number of unbound and bound journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to provide for their distribution, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3727) for the relief of William P. Gorsuch, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, to or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas, and authorizing said company to build a bridge across the Arkansas River, at or near the city of Fort Smith, Ark., reported it with amendments.

COMPILATION OF REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report adversely the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] March 27, 1888, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, directed to provide for a duplicate of the compilation of reports of committees provided for in public resolution No. 24, first session Forty-ninth Congress, approved July 29, 1886; said duplicate of House reports to be for the use of Senate committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adverse report will be agreed to, if there be no objection, and the resolution indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back, in lieu of the resolution just postponed, a joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration. It is designed to accomplish the same purpose.

The joint resolution (S. R. 77) providing for a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1815 to 1887 was read twice by its title, and by unanimous consent considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Joint Committee on Public Printing to provide a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of committees of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1815 to 1887 provided for in public resolution No. 24, first session Forty-ninth Congress, approved July 29, 1886, and further provided for in concurrent resolution of March 3, 1887, and appropriates the sum of $4,000 for the preparation of the work, and the further sum of $1,477 to cover a deficiency in the cost of the original compilation made necessary by concurrent resolution of March 3, 1887, which sum may be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury on the order of the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing as additional pay or compensation to any officer or employé of the United States; and it directs the Public Printer to bind said duplicate of the compilation of the reports without delay.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to send to the Senate as soon as may be a complete list of the laborers, skilled laborers, messengers, model attendants, and other persons below the classified service who have been appointed or employed in the Interior Department in Washington since March 4, 1885. Also a list of all persons who have been appointed in said Department in Washington since March 4, 1885, to any position, class, or grade, who have been since their appointment or are now employed in a position, class, or grade different from the one to which they were appointed, giving in detail the change in position, rank, or grade of employment in regard to each person separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over under the rule.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. INGALLS (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). Mr. President, shortly after the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] began his speech yesterday I was called from the Senate to examine and sign a large number of enrolled bills for transmission to the President of the United States. I had supposed from the notice he gave that his speech was to be devoted to the subject of the tariff and finance; and I was, therefore, somewhat surprised this morning to be advised by an item in the newspapers that I had been the object of the Senator's animadversion.

A casual examination of his speech appeared to me to disclose certain omissions on his part in reference to the relation of the Democratic party to the subject of pensions, to the war for the preservation of the Union, to the reconstruction of the Southern States, to the solid South, to the recent election in Louisiana, and to the issues and results of the approaching campaign, which seem to me to justify some observations of mine in reply.

I therefore desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock, if the Senate will indulge me, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 925) for the relief of Matthew W. Berryman;

A bill (H. R. 6862) for the relief of John R. Wood, John T. Ballard, and John T. Belew; and

A bill (H. R. 8279) to authorize the county of Laurens, in the State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Oconee River at or near Dublin, in said county and State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that at the conclusion of the morning business the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar was to be moved this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that course, but I suggest, as a matter of convenience and to avoid delay, that bills for the construction of public buildings which have been reported favorably be also acted upon subject to objection.

Mr. BERRY. By the unanimous consent of the Senate yesterday we were to proceed this morning with the land-forfeiture bill. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who has the bill in charge, is not in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was at first under the impression that such was the agreement, but is informed by the clerks that the RECORD does not disclose that to be the fact; and as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] had previously given notice that he would move this morning to proceed to the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar to which there was no objection, the Chair announced that as the order of business.

Mr. BERRY. I have no objection whatever to proceeding with the pension bills. I simply saw that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands was not in, and called attention to what I understood to be the agreement of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is fortified in the position he has taken by the fact that the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, is not in his seat.

Mr. HOAR. I have no personal choice about the matter, but I understood the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, just before the adjournment last evening, when the matter then under discussion was about to be laid aside, to ask unanimous consent that it be proceeded with after the routine morning business to-day. It seems I was in error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the RECORD examined. [A pause.] The first impression of the Chair was correct about the order of business. On page 3515 of the RECORD appears an announcement from the Chair, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may come up at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the pending bill, Senate bill 1430, may be resumed to-morrow at the conclusion of the formal morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending which bill, the Chair understands the Senator from Minnesota to ask that the private pension bills on the Calendar to which there is no objection may be considered. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 1430?

Mr. PLUMB. I certainly do; and I think the convenience of the Senate will be best subserved by going ahead with that bill. The pension bills are sure to get through. I never have known any of them to fail. Of course I do not speak of that as in derogation of the zeal of the Senator from Minnesota, but certainly there will be plenty of time when the consideration of the pension bills will not interfere with the legitimate order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1430 will be proceeded with.

PARIS INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to present the report of the committee of conference on House joint resolution 83.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, and 13, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: On page 2, line 9, after "appoint," insert "as assistants to the Commissioner-General;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: On page 3, line 17, in lieu of the sum named, insert "$250,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: On page 3, line 24, after "exposition," insert "and accompany the same with a report respecting such production, to be printed in the English, French, and German languages;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
WM. M. EVARTS,
JOSEPH E. BROWN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

PERRY BELMONT,
ROBERT R. HITT,
ISIDOR RAYNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. DOLPH to the amendment of Mr. HOAR.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make one observation, with the leave of the Senate.

I am told that in the remarks which I made yesterday on the pending bill I stated that a list of entries or attempted entries which I gave to the reporter to be published as part of my remarks was a list of entries which were all made within the land now owned or claimed by the canal company. I have not found in glancing over my remarks that statement as yet, but I am told that I made it. If I did so, I made it under a temporary misapprehension. I should have said that the entries were made upon land either of the canal company or of private claimants.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will report the pending question, which is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "that," in line 1 of Mr. HOAR'S amendment, and to insert:

That portion of the grant made to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line by an act of Congress entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, forfeited by the first section of this act as between all adverse claimants to the same under the laws of the United States and as against the United States and the State of Michigan, shall be deemed and held to have been restored to and to have become a part of the public domain at the date of the execution of the deed of release of said lands to the United States by the governor of said State, to wit, August 14, 1870.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. As I have said before, I suspect all of these amendments. In taking the ground that I do I feel very much like the shepherd boy of Israel when he went out to fight Goliath, only that my case is a little worse than David's was, for although I have the pebbles from the brook, I have not any sling with which to hurl them.

I was not aware until this came up for discussion that I was going to be placed in the same position as Fitz-James when he met Roderick Dhu in the woods. I did not suppose that every bush contained an armed man, who at the whistle of the chieftain would appear to take his side; and in any remarks that I may offer in opposition to the position taken by the gentlemen on the other side, I want you to take into consideration the disparity of argumentative abilities between us.

Here are men well trained in the forum, gladiators of the arena intellectually, who all seem to be upon one side. I am but a plain, blunt man; can tell what I do know not always very concisely or connectedly, sometimes very disjointedly, but I think that I can make a tolerable case; but if I can not I hope that the Senate will take the material that I offer and imagine if it was used by the opposite side how potent and how conclusive it would be.

These amendments keep coming up. As one becomes obscure and seems to be doomed to defeat, another appears, and this has been the case in all the legislation upon this point since 1880.

In 1873 it became patent to every one that the title of this canal company was defective, but no attempt at relief was made until the railroad grant was conferred upon the Ontonagon and Brulé road. That was in 1880. There had been seven years during which the canal company knew that their title was defective. Why was there no attempt made for relief? The fact was that they knew that every process under the original grant had been irregular, and they hoped that time would cure their title, and that continuance in possession would give them rights that they could not claim under the law.

To show you how insidious all of the efforts of the canal company have been and how they have attempted to accomplish by indirection what they could not accomplish by direct legislation, I will give a history of their efforts for a single year. Here is the bill introduced by Mr. PAYSON in the Forty-ninth Congress, House bill 391, sent to the Senate at the last session:

That all lands granted to the State of Michigan under the act of Congress approved June 3, 1856, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and the lands covered thereby shall be considered and treated in all respects the same as if said grant had never been made.

That is one of the most harmless and innocent bills on its face that one could conceive of; and yet what would have been its effect? It would have confirmed the canal grant. If there had been nothing else in the way this language would have removed the only obstacle, which was the Ontonagon and Brulé road grant. To be sure, it would not have changed the illegality of their action in regard to the entry of those lands, but it would have removed the Ontonagon and Brulé grant from their path. That bill came over to the Senate. The Senate amended it thus: They struck out, in lines 8 and 9, the words:

And the lands covered thereby shall be considered and treated in all respects the same as if said grant had never been made.

That was stricken out by the committee of the Senate, and this was substituted:

Are restored to the public domain.

That did not pass in the Senate and did not go to a committee of conference, as they undoubtedly hoped, and therefore they got no confirmation as far as the removal of the obstruction of the Ontonagon and Brulé road was concerned in that bill.

This year the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], after this railroad forfeiture bill came up, introduced, by request, a certain amendment. I do not think that he saw at the time its bearing, but in that we find:

That * * * any of the lands * * * selected by any State and certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and approved by the Secretary of the Interior in satisfaction or as part of any grant to such State in aid of any public work or improvement which has been fully completed, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming any such lands under such sales, entries, or selections and certificates shall be, and are hereby, confirmed.

That was not pushed. Then another one was presented by my colleague [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], and I do not think that he saw the bearing of its phraseology, but it included some points wherein he and I agreed as to protecting the rights of certain private entry cash purchasers to their lands, where there was no conflict, in this tract which is about to be forfeited.

I submitted certain amendments to his amendment, which he accepted; but the reading of the first amendment brought about the whole of this discussion. We left out "locations or State selections." That immediately struck the bull's-eye of the canal company, and at once the quadrille commenced. The whole discussion so far on this bill, it seems to me, has been upon that single phrase. I have an amendment here which I would offer and may offer hereafter, but at the same time I do not think it is worth while to take up the time of the Senate at the present for that purpose.

Mr. President, before going further I should like to submit some papers in vindication of a certain party who has rights which he can not himself defend upon this floor. Yesterday, during the discussion, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], I believe, pointed to a certain gentleman in the gallery and spoke of him. I do not know whether the manner was very offensive, but it was in a way to associate him with a discreditable transaction. I thought at the time that it was a very peculiar state of affairs when a homesteader, living in this tract, could not have a single vidette in the gallery when the turrets, posterns, and embrasures of the Senate were filled by armed men on the other side, and on that account I will send these papers, marked 1, 2, and 3, to be read and to go into the RECORD.

The Secretary read as follows:

No. 1.

[Office of James K. Redington, attorney at law, St. Cloud Building, Ninth and F streets.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have long since learned that it is generally unpleasant and sometimes dangerous to espouse the cause of a settler against corporate influence and power. Still, my conception of professional duty and obligation often places me in that situation.

I have the honor to place in your hands, for such use as you deem proper, the following papers:

1. Copy of an affidavit filed by me with the Secretary of the Interior on the 3d day of December, 1885, refuting, so far as I am concerned, the insinuation of the ex parte papers read in the Senate yesterday, in respect to an alleged conspiracy to locate settlers on the Ontonagon and Brulé lands. The allegations of this affidavit have never, to my knowledge, been contradicted or denied since its execution two years and a half ago.

2. My affidavit acknowledged this day relating to the papers read yesterday in the Senate.

In my card to you yesterday, printed in to-day's RECORD, I was mistaken in saying my affidavit therein referred to one filed in the Interior Department. Upon reflection I now know that it was filed with the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES K. REDINGTON.

Hon. T. W. PALMER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

No. 2.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

I, James K. Redington, depose and say that I am an attorney at law and practice my profession in said city and District; that on the 30th day of March, 1883, I entered into partnership for practice in land cases with W. C. Hill, of said city and District, under the firm name of Redington & Hill, which partnership was continued until November 5, 1883, a little over seven months, when the same was dissolved by mutual consent. At the commencement of said partnership both myself and Mr. Hill represented, individually, a number of settlers claiming lands, under the pre-emption and homestead laws, within the limits of the so-called Ontonagon and State Line Railroad grant in the State of Michigan; that these several individual cases became part of the general partnership business; and that thereafter the said firm were retained by a very large number of other settlers claiming other lands in the vicinity mentioned.

Upon the dissolution of said firm I became its general successor, but in the cases hereinbefore mentioned the fees due and to become due remained the joint property of myself and said Hill. Mr. Hill has since sold and assigned, for a valuable consideration, all his interest in the said business, and has now no connection whatever with or interest in the same.

I further depose and say that, by mutual agreement, upon the organization of said firm, I became, and thereafter was, so long as it continued, the actual manager of all its legal business, and upon its dissolution legally assumed and have exercised like full and absolute control of all unfinished business; that during the summer and fall of 1883 I attempted to get the mass of papers then in our possession relating to these cases into something like order; that in so arranging the cases I found, among papers that had been sent to Mr. Hill, some sixteen contracts, signed by settlers, agreeing, in event of success, to convey certain prescribed interests in the land in consideration of legal services in respect thereto; that I immediately called Mr. Hill's attention to the matter; told him that, in my judgment, such contracts were illegal and improper, and that in any event I would have nothing to do with them; that he fully agreed with me in the matter, and as a result of such consultation, I, on behalf of the firm, wrote and mailed to John B. Weimer, at Iron River, a letter on the subject, a full and true copy of which is hereto attached marked Exhibit A, and made part hereof, and at the same time sent the contracts to him by express. Some of the persons named substituted written contracts for money fees; some did not, and these cases were abandoned; some were continued without any agreement whatever. The original contracts, as stated by said Weimer in his affidavit, dated October 31, 1885, were destroyed.

I further depose and say that said Weimer, by reason of his ability, faithfulness, and intelligence, is greatly respected by the laboring men and settlers in that vicinity, and is much consulted by them in business matters. Hence it was the habit of the firm, and is now my practice, to correspond with him in most cases, instead of the claimants direct, thus saving a great deal of unnecessary labor. As I now recollect, most of the contracts referred to, if not all, had been forwarded by him, at request of the claimants, and were hence sent back to him for the purpose indicated. Except in some such way as this, said Weimer has never been the agent of the firm or of myself, or, so far as I know, of Mr. Hill, and never, in any form, for any pay or compensation of any kind, express or implied.

I further depose and say that after the return of said contracts it was my invariable and unbroken rule and practice, in managing said firm affairs as aforesaid, to decline all similar contracts, although frequently offered them by claimants or local counsel, and to accept only retainers or contingent fees in money, unequivocally and unmistakably expressed on the face of the contract, without condition of any kind, in any event, affecting or by any possibility embracing any interest in the land, or any part thereof. Such simple money contracts were taken in large numbers, and now remain among the assets of said firm.

I further depose and say that in all the cases above described, forming part of the assets of said firm, there is not a single contract or agreement, express or implied, for anything except a simple money fee; and no contract of any kind or character, remotely or immediately affecting, or by any possibility to affect any interest in the land, or any part thereof, or any interest in any mineral contained therein, or any part thereof, or any timber thereon, or on any part thereof.

I further depose and say that I know one A. Mathews, a land attorney at Marquette; and have read certain papers purporting to be letters written to him by said W. C. Hill, and filed with the Secretary, none of which, however, with one exception, that of July 10, 1883, purport to have been written during the existence of the firm of Redington & Hill. As to any of these alleged letters other than that of July 10, 1883, I have no knowledge whatever, and never heard of them until read in part during the recent argument; but I do know and say that the firm of Redington & Hill never received from said Mathews, either directly or through Mr. Hill, a single contract of any kind or description from any pre-emption or homestead settler; nor did I ever receive a single contract from him, nor did Mr. Hill, so far as I know. He is not and never has been in the most remote degree in any way interested in any of the cases hereinbefore referred to, or any such cases undertaken by us or by me, or, so far as I know, by Mr. Hill.

I further depose and say that the letter from myself to said Mathews, filed with the letters last above referred to, and dated May 26, 1884, was an answer to one from Mathews, dated May 20, 1884, original of which is hereto attached, marked Exhibit B, and refers, as will be seen, to a Porterfield scrip location made by Mathews, at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., some 200 miles from Iron River, and has no reference whatever to any homestead or pre-emption claim. The fee referred to was never adjusted, and I have long since abandoned all connection with the case.

I further depose and say that I have read an affidavit of one Clarence McDermott, dated July 21, 1884, filed in the Ross-Weimer case, in which affiant swears that he once saw a contract drawn between Joseph Collier and Redington & Hill, in which was a condition that in default of paying a certain sum, in a certain time, "said Collier should convey to them the value of $500 in the fee of said land," and further that said contract was made with Weimer as agent for Redington & Hill; and with reference thereto I say that no such contract was ever made with said firm, through Weimer or any one else; that McDermott, therefore, never saw such a contract, and his statement to that effect, either willful or otherwise, is untrue.

On the contrary, the only contract we ever had with said Collier was entered into through correspondence directly with the claimant, or some one writing for him in his name; the contract itself was drawn by me, and is for a money fee, pure and simple, in proof of which I hereto attach and make part hereof the following papers: Original letter from Collier, or some one for him signing his name, dated July 6, 1883, marked Exhibit C; copy of answer thereto, marked Exhibit D; original contract, marked Exhibit E; letter of Weimer transmitting same, marked Exhibit F.

And further deponent says not.

JAMES K. REDINGTON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 2d day of December, 1885.

[SEAL.] HILMAN A. HALL,
Notary Public.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question at that point?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator has had an opportunity now to inform himself, so that he can answer the question put yesterday, and that is, whether he is informed that the letters I read yesterday are genuine or not.

Mr. PALMER. I never thought of asking the question.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend will pardon me. As I understand this present affidavit the affiant says that there were sixteen contracts which were found a little later in the Department, and that he, when they came to his knowledge, thought they were illegal and repudiated them, and required a substitution of a contract for a money or contingent fee. That does not seem to me to affect at all the force of the fact that the original settlers went on there under a contract which would require them to commit perjury, as any lawyer who understood the law would know.

I read in addition from the same firm letters which contained this statement. One of them stated that they knew it would be necessary for these people to commit perjury, and another, speaking of a doubt whether all persons would go on with it if they had not a moral twist on them. It seems to me that the genuineness of these contracts, though sixteen of them were admitted at once to have been executed, is of even secondary importance to the question of the genuineness of these letters, and I was in hope my honorable friend would have had an opportunity to let us know whether these letters were disputed or not.

Mr. PALMER. I would say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I did not consider the genuineness of these letters of particular importance. Whether rascals are wrestling over the carcass or not is not to our purpose. The question is whether this canal company has a legal or an equitable claim to these lands.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me. In one of the letters read, signed "James K. Redington," is this:

> I think, under all the circumstances of the case, you should send me, say, $250 retainer, and give me a contingent interest in the claim.

Mr. PALMER. I would ask the Senator what pertinence that has to the debate.

Mr. HOAR. Very great pertinence. The question between him and me, not personally, of course, but the information which I get is that the persons who piled up these claims on these lands are not genuine homesteaders, but they are men who were procured to go there and make claims on the lands by a firm in Washington who were to have a contingent interest in the result, hoping that Congress would treat these persons as genuine homesteaders when they were really men who were sent on for the purpose of making claims.

There are found in the Interior Department forms of contract showing that these men who went on there had made arrangements to convey a quarter part of their interest, which arrangements required them under our homestead law to commit perjury in order to complete their entries, because they must depose that they have not made any such agreement. The Senator shows or the affidavit which he has caused to be read shows that there were sixteen of those contracts found in the office of this firm, and one particular contract produced here this man says is not genuine; but my proposition is, suppose that to be all true or not true, here are these records in which these people swear to the arrangement, and it seems to me that it is a very important matter for us to know whether they are genuine or not.

Mr. PALMER. I should answer the Senator in regard to that in this way, that I am not fighting the rights of the canal company. I am not particularly fighting for the rights of the homesteaders. I am fighting for the exclusion of any such confirmation in this bill as proposed by these different amendments, and I think I have shown that they have sought by indirection, first by allowing time to elapse when they knew their title from other causes was invalid, which I shall show further one, and then when the Ontonagon and Brulé Company had the right conferred on it, have sought by indirect measures in legislation to have their title confirmed and in every insidious way. I have no doubt that every land bill that has been introduced either in the House or in the Senate is known within twenty-four hours by the agents of the canal company in this city. I have no doubt but what each bill is followed through the committees. I have no doubt that when it comes into the Senate they know the way to submit amendments that will go to the committee, or whether they would like to have them appended in open session.

The amendments that have been introduced here should have been referred to the committee, where they should have been considered properly, and we should have had a report from the committee. There was nothing of the kind. They lay on the table. If some watchful eye had not been fixed upon them they might have been slipped through without debate, and there would have been hardly a Senator here, unless it had been those who had been inspired by the canal company, who would have known their effect.

I am contending against the adoption of any amendment of this kind upon this bill. I am perfectly willing to have equal and exact justice conceded to the canal company, but I say that a sweeping amendment of this kind, on a bill of this nature, is not an amendment which should be considered here.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask another question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the Senator aware that the late Secretary of the Interior, now a Senator in this body, caused to be printed and gave notice of the proposed amendment some weeks ago? How can the Senator say it was sought to be put through without consideration?

Mr. PALMER. I say just as I said before, and I will venture——

Mr. HOAR. It was printed by order of the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. I venture, if a poll of the Senate could be taken, it would appear that the greater number of Senators never knew of that amendment until it came up for discussion. I did not know it myself, and I had considerable interest in it, until it was called to my attention. There are thousands of amendments put on our tables that a great many Senators do not read, particularly we of young service.

Mr. HOAR. What should have been done?

Mr. PALMER. It should have been referred to the committee. It was known that that railroad forfeiture bill was in the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Was it not referred to the committee when introduced by Mr. TELLER?

Mr. PALMER. I understand not. I understand it was never considered by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan desire the further reading of the papers sent up?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir; I think that is only fair to a gentleman who was attacked on the floor of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading, as follows:

Messrs. REDINGTON & HILL.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

I, James K. Redington, being first duly sworn, depose and say that the correspondence and papers read in debate in the Senate of the United States on the 25th day of April, 1888, while Senate bill 1430 was under consideration, are printed copies of papers filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior in the month of October, 1885, during the oral argument of a certain case then pending in said Department, entitled John B. Weimer vs. John D. Ross; that in said case the plaintiff, Weimer, was represented by Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, late a Senator from the State of Indiana, and myself; and that during the oral argument of said case before the Secretary, on or about the 25th day of October, 1885, the said papers were produced and read by counsel for Ross.

The paper then produced and read purporting to be a contract between one John Rutter and the firm of Redington & Hill I had seen at an earlier date. It had been previously read by counsel for Ross before the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives, where I denounced it as fictitious and manufactured for the purpose of injuring the claims of settlers, and at the same time filed with the said committee an affidavit declaring that no such contract had ever existed and that I had never before heard of any such man. I now again declare that no such contract was ever held by, offered to, or tendered the firm of Redington & Hill or myself, or, so far as I know, Mr. Hill; that no such contract was ever accepted by us or was ever for a moment in our possession, and that if any such man as John Rutter exists and he signed the paper in question, it was done without our procurement or consent, and, as I believe and aver, simply for use in discrediting the claims of bona fide settlers on these lands. The paper itself, however, has never been proved or attempted to be proved by the oath of any one in any proceeding, or at any time or place.

As to the correspondence produced and read at such hearing between W. C. Hill and one A. Matthews, and repeated in the debate of the Senate on the 25th of April, 1885, its production at such hearing was a complete surprise to both Mr. McDonald and myself. I had no previous knowledge of its existence, and at first believed the letters to be forgeries. Upon close examination of the originals, however, I became convinced that they were genuine. I so told Mr. McDonald, and we thereupon call upon Mr. Hill (with whom I had then long since severed all business relations) for an explanation. He did not deny the genuineness of the letters, and Mr. McDonald and myself thereupon announced our intention of entirely withdrawing from the whole line of cases unless every remaining interest of the said Hill in the matter was absolutely and entirely released and surrendered.

The result was his absolute withdrawal from the cases and the assignment for value, of all his interest in the contracts, which said contracts covered nothing but money fees for services performed or to be performed. So far as my name in any way appears in such correspondence, and so far as any letters written by me are concerned, there is not a word or syllable connecting me with any such contracts except as declining to have anything to do with and returning sundry of them to claimants. The letter of May 26, 1884, from me to Matthews, related to a controversy affecting land at least 200 miles from the lands here in question, and had nothing whatever to do with any claim or claims arising under either the pre-emption or homestead laws, and as the retainer called for was never paid, I never appeared for him in that case, nor indeed in any other case, so far as I now recollect, in my life.

I further depose and say that in answer to the ex parte papers, so read by counsel, I filed in the Interior Department, December 3, 1885, an affidavit, copy of which accompanies this deposition, which affidavit is now on file therein, and which has never, to my knowledge, been since in any way denied.

I further depose and say that the partnership between myself and W. C. Hill only continued about seven months; that since the dissolution of said firm on the 5th day of November, 1883, the said Hill has had no connection with the cases in question whatever as an attorney, I having exclusive charge thereof so far as he was concerned, and that since about the 25th day of October, 1883, he has had no interest whatever in or about the matter.

I further depose and say that the settlers in question are now and since the dissolution of the said firm of Redington & Hill have been represented solely and entirely, in the Department, the courts, and Congress, by the firm of McDonald, Bright & Fay, composed of Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, Richard J. Bright, and John C. Fay, and by this deponent. We jointly appear for such claimants in the Department, the courts of the United States, and, so far as necessary to protect the interests of our clients, in Congress. We so appear for ninety-two actual settlers, only ten of whom conflict with selections made by the canal company, the balance being opposed by the railroad and private entry claimants. All these cases, except the ten against the canal company, so far as applying to odd sections, have been practically decided in favor of the settlers by the Secretary of the Interior, in his decision of January 6, 1888, in the case of Wakefield vs. Cutter et al. The cases we represent are a small portion of the actual settlers understood to be located on these railroad lands, the balance being unrepresented by counsel.

I further depose and say that in my entire experience at the bar, covering a practice of some thirteen years in land matters, I have never had a contract or an interest in a contract affecting in any way the land claimed by any pre-emption or homestead settler, although repeatedly offered them from various parts of the country; that I have persistently refused to accept cases on such terms, and have advised scores and perhaps hundreds of settlers that such contracts were prohibited by law; that I never had and have not now, either individually or as a member of the late firm of Redington & Hill, or otherwise, any contract with any settler in the State of Michigan or elsewhere of this character or of any character except for the payment of a fair money fee for services to be fairly rendered; and that to the best of my information and belief no settler on the Ontonagon and Brulé lands so called, in the State of Michigan, has any such contract with any person or persons whomsoever.

I further depose and say that neither as an individual nor as a member of the late firm did I ever procure or induce a single settler to settle upon these lands; that I never had an agent or agents to represent me among these settlers for any purpose whatever, nor did said firm; that I have discouraged rather than encouraged settlements on these lands, but that whenever consulted by such settlers I have honestly expressed my opinion as to the legal status of these lands and have not hesitated and shall not hesitate to accept employment from settlers in this vicinity; and, thus employed, I shall defend their rights to the best of my ability, in a legitimate manner, wherever assailed.

In respect to the correspondence between said Hill and said Matthews, all of which was prior to the organization of the late firm of Redington & Hill, I depose and say that although discreditable, to say the least, to the parties themselves, it ought not, in my judgment, to prejudice the rights of bona fide settlers residing on these lands, nor be used to the injury of those, myself included, who had no connection therewith and repudiated the same as soon as it was discovered.

JAMES K. REDINGTON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 26th day of April, 1888.

[SEAL.] JOHN T. ARMS,
Notary Public.

Mr. PALMER (exhibiting a map of the upper peninsula of Michigan, showing selections by the canal company colored in red). Mr. President, the history of this canal grant and selection was pretty well recited yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], but I should like—because ocular demonstration is sometimes very healthful—Senators to observe how these selections were made. The first grant of 1865 of 200,000 acres was to be taken nearest the canal in a compact form. There are at least in that first grant 100,000 acres or more between part of the selections and the canal itself, showing that they had gone away from the canal and selected lands more remote, because they were more valuable.

Why did they do it? It is a well-known fact—I know it myself, for I have been over the ground—that this was regarded forty years ago, and is so displayed upon Foster and Whitney's map, as mineral land. Here was the great Minnesota mine, which was the paragon of all copper mines until the Calumet and Hecla were discovered. There was the Toltec, and there were a great many others that I have now forgotten the names of. Lake Agogebic was surrounded by mines, but the copper mining there was not successful with the exception of the Minnesota mine, and that "petered out," to use a technical phrase in mining.

But on Foster and Whitney's map all of this land, flecked over by the selections of the canal company, is put down as mineral land. In the act granting the lands to the canal company all lands that were designated as mineral, whether they were mineral or not, were excluded. Notwithstanding that they went on, and in direct violation of the law located the lands as you see on the map.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are those lands designated on the United States maps and surveys as mineral lands?

Mr. PALMER. They are. Foster and Whitney's map is the great map of the Lake Superior region, also Pumpelly's, who was the geologist of the State of Michigan. The map before me shows the trap-rock belt containing copper, extending beyond the extreme end of Keewenaw Point down to the Montreal River, the western boundary of Michigan. That was undoubtedly the reason why they took the land there instead of in a compact form near the canal, just as remotely from it as they possibly could, because it covered these copper mines.

Mr. HARRIS. That you say was not authorized by the act?

Mr. PALMER. It was expressly prohibited. In other words, no mineral lands were to be taken. These were known as mineral lands.

Mr. HARRIS. That was in the act?

Mr. PALMER. That was in the act.

Mr. HARRIS. As I understand the Senator, they made these locations on mineral lands.

Mr. PALMER. Contrary to law. I will read the act. This is section 2 of the act of March 3, 1865:

And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the said State of Michigan, for the purpose of aiding said State in constructing and completing a harbor and ship-canal to connect the waters of Lake Superior with the waters of Portage Lake, 200,000 acres of public lands, to be selected in subdivisions agreeably to the United States survey, by an agent or agents appointed by the governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from any lands in the upper peninsula of said State, subject to private entry: Provided, That said selections shall be made from alternate and odd-numbered sections of land nearest the location of said canal.

Mr. DAWES. That was the first 200,000 acres that were located. Will you indicate where?

Mr. PALMER. There were about 100,000 acres located nearest the canal. Then they went further west and located 100,000 acres, leaving a hiatus of over 100,000 acres between the last 100,000 acres and the canal.

I will continue reading from the act:

Provided, That said selections shall be made from alternate and odd-numbered sections of land nearest the location of said canal in said upper peninsula, not otherwise appropriated, and not from lands designated by the United States as "mineral"—

It does not say "not from mineral lands," but "lands designated as mineral."

Mr. COCKRELL. The question is, were any lands in that region designated by the United States as mineral?

Mr. PALMER. I understand they were. We shall come to that a little later.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. Allow me to suggest that I think my colleague is mistaken in that regard. No lands in Michigan have ever been held by the Government as mineral lands. The geological survey shows that the State has made that distinction, but the United States has never held any lands in Michigan from sale on account of their being mineral.

Mr. PALMER. As I grow older I have learned not to be positive, and I shall take further time to post myself on that, so that I can speak authoritatively.

Mr. DAWES. Now, have you the second act?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir. I will get down to that in a moment. I go on with the proviso of the act of 1865:

in said upper peninsula, not otherwise appropriated, and not from lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of this act, nor from lands to which the rights of pre-emption or homestead have attached.

July 3, 1866, Congress passed another act, granting to the State an additional amount of 200,000 acres, to be selected, 150,000 from alternate odd and 50,000 from even numbered sections in the upper peninsula of Michigan, "not mineral," and to which pre-emption and homestead rights had not attached, said additional grant to inure to the said Portage Lake and Lake Superior Canal Company.

Now, we shall see how the General Government——

Mr. DAWES. In this connection will the Senator add that the lands in question are in the second appropriation and not in the first? Is not that so?

Mr. PALMER. Really I can not say; I shall not be positive. I do not want to say anything that I shall be corrected on hereafter. That is another question, however, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, that I shall be prepared to answer the next time we meet.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator understand that these 15,000 acres are in the second grant or in the first?

Mr. PALMER. The Senator does not speak loud enough for me to hear him.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator himself understand that the 15,000 acres here alluded to are in the second grant and not in the first?

Mr. PALMER. I do not know, sir, but I understand that it is claimed that these acts should be construed together; being in pari materia. Is that the correct phrase? I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The phrase may be correct. The application may be different.

Mr. PALMER. I merely stated what I understood.

Mr. DAWES. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I will read from the Land Office report of 1886 while we are on that question:

The ship-canal company selected 68,647.47 acres which were embraced in said offering, and it not appearing from an examination of the tract-books that the same had been offered as mineral they were approved to the State for its benefit.

Recapitulating the result of the adjustment of the grant of 1865, it appears:

First. That the company did not select any lands but such as were subject to private entry.

Second. That, taking all the lands selected and approved, it selected 93,712.77 acres which were not at date of selection the vacant lands nearest the location of the canal.

If the Senator from Missouri will listen to the paragraph I am about to read it will give him the information he desires:

Third. That it selected 68,647.47 acres which had been proclaimed and offered as mineral prior to the passage of the granting act.

Fourth. That it selected 56,916.57 acres of non-mineral lands which were not at date of selection the vacant lands nearest the location of the canal.

In giving my views upon the bill under consideration I will first refer to the lands embraced in the offering of 1851.

The act of 1865 excluded from the grant made thereby all lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of said act.

Whether or not the lands selected under the grant actually contained mineral was not material. If they had been designated by the United States as mineral prior to the passage of the granting act they were not subject to selection.

After the passage of the act of 1847, this office, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, decided to treat as mineral the lands covered by leases, permits, or titles of occupancy—those which the legal officers should be satisfied from any source were of that character, and those which might be reported by the mineral agent or geologist.

The act of September 28, 1850, made the mineral lands subject to sale and entry in the same manner and at the same minimum price as other public lands, but the distinction between the mineral and non-mineral lands was maintained by this office. The lands supposed to contain mineral were offered as such in 1851. The unoffered non-mineral lands were offered in 1853. The letter transmitting to the local officers a list of the lands embraced in the offering of 1853 distinctly states that such lands were not offered in 1851 because they were not mineral lands according to the reports. The offering of 1851, according to the proclamation, embraced lands formerly covered by mineral leases and permits, and lands which had been reported as mineral by the geologist.

The proclaiming and offering of these lands at public sale as mineral lands, taken in connection with the instructions in the premises, was clearly a designation by the United States as mineral. Having been so designated, they were not subject to selection under the canal grant.

According to the sworn testimony of its president, the Lake Superior Ship-Canal Railway and Iron Company, successor to the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, does, or did in 1881, still own the lands in question, and, in my opinion, a suit should be instituted against said company to vacate and set aside the certification made to the State in 1868, so far as the same includes lands embraced in the offering of 1851, amounting to 68,647.47 acres.

The question is different, however, as to the lands which were not at date of selection the lands nearest the location of the canal.

I think that that is an answer to the question of the Senator from Missouri whether they were designated as mineral lands. Further, this is in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1886, on page 35:

Lands which had been designated by the United States as "mineral" prior to March 3, 1865, were excluded from the grant of lands made by act of Congress of that date for the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal. Notwithstanding this express exception in the granting act upward of 68,000 acres which had been designated by the United States as mineral before March 3, 1865, including some of the most valuable lands in the copper range of the upper peninsula of Michigan, were certified and approved by this Department for the benefit of the ship-canal company. Suit was recommended by this office June 9, 1886, to recover said mineral lands to the United States.

Mr. President, it was a matter of public notoriety that all that land in the west part of the selection was mineral land. I knew it in 1845. I helped to hoe potatoes in 1845, I have no doubt, upon one of those sections, where my father had a mine located under the old permit system. It was notorious and a great many mines that promised fairly were opened there, many millions of money expended, and, as I said before, the Minnesota mine, which was the paragon of all copper mines until the Calumet and Hecla came up, was in that locality.

So there was undoubtedly a deliberate design on their part to get hold of mineral lands and they violated the law. How were they to accomplish that? This is all a matter of evidence, and testimony was given before a House committee on this subject:

The reason why the law was thus violated is apparent from a—

I now read from the report in the matter of the investigation of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal before the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives:

The reason why the law was thus violated is apparent from a bare inspection of the Foster and Whitney map, and the map made by Professor Pumpelly accompanying his official report to the State of Michigan, which was exhibited to the committee. Both of these maps show the copper belt, or the trap rock within which the copper was supposed to lie, extending from the extreme end of Keweenaw Point southwest to the Montreal River.

I know that has always been regarded as the mineral belt.

The selections made under the act of 1865 were intended to cover this entire belt, and were made to fit it as closely as a glove to the hand. The map of the canal selections is almost a reproduction of the copper belt, as shown by these other maps. The obvious intent was to appropriate this entire copper belt, and to do this it was found necessary to leave out of the selections 108,000 acres included in the granting act, and to take in a like quantity not included within the descriptive terms of the grant.

Now, how was it accomplished?

This was accomplished by securing the removal of Edwards, the then register, who refused to corruptly act as a tool of the company—and the appointment of Ambrose Campbell, who administered the office after his appointment entirely in their interest and in the interest of other corrupt combinations. John F. Driggs, then member of Congress from that district, was attempting to carry some 11,000 acres of land for his own benefit, without paying the Government for it. The lands had been marked to his name upon the plat-books. He was unable to raise the money, and made arrangements with the company by which the lands were to be marked off to them, and they were to carry them for the benefit of Driggs until such time as he could raise the requisite amount to complete the purchase.

I am now reading from a brief filed with the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, Forty-eighth Congress—

Edwards refused to be a party to this arrangement. Driggs and Avery, president of the canal company, then conspired to secure his removal and the appointment of Campbell. This was accomplished. The canal company thereupon secured the approval of their illegal list. The 11,000 acres of land were marked up to the canal company, and were by them carried for Driggs for some three years—until 1871—when the money to complete their purchase was advanced by one Sage, to whom the certificates issued. Driggs realized some $40,000 out of the transaction, and the canal company secured a list of its illegal selections. The whole transaction, as above stated, is shown in the testimony.

And here the names and pages are given wherein this appears in evidence. That is the way they got the land in violation of the law.

Now let us see what they gave. It is claimed that they have an equitable right to this land. Let us see how they carried out their part of the contract, the consideration. This is from the report by Mr. Henley, from the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, March 5, 1884, entitled "Forfeited lands in Michigan:"

It will also be observed that the company was required by the granting act to construct a breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal at least 13 feet in depth, and that by section 5 of the act of 1865, if the work was not "completed" within two years (afterwards extended to December 1, 1873), the lands thereby granted should "revert to the United States."

It is satisfactorily shown to your committee that no sufficient harbor or breakwater has ever been constructed, and that all that has ever been done by the company or its successors to earn this grant was to build a canal about 2 miles in length, connecting Portage Lake with Lake Superior, and at one end thereof build two piers some 600 feet in length, extending into the lake. Even this work was not reported as having been done until June 25, 1875, over eighteen months after the right of forfeiture had accrued under the extending acts. (Governor's certificate, appendix to Canal History, pages 73, 74.)

It still further appears, from the official records of the office of the Chief of Engineers, in the War Department, that the said canal had not up to 1879 been completed in the manner required by the act, particularly as to the depth of water required, actual soundings in that year by the Government engineers showing an average of much less than 13 feet. Your committee has no information that any work has been done upon the canal since that date.

December 16, 1879, Maj. Henry M. Robert, of the Engineer Corps, United States Army, reported as follows upon this subject:

"I do not think the entrance to the canal can be said to be completed until the piers are extended to a depth of water equal to that which is considered necessary at the harbors constructed directly by the United States. If this were done a great deal of the difficulty experienced in entering the canal would disappear. It is not to be expected that a vessel can be easily steered in rough water when its keel almost touches bottom. This lack of depth of water at the head of the canal is, in my judgment, the greatest difficulty at this point, and the remedy is for the canal company to complete the work, to aid which the United States donated 400,000 acres of land."

From all the foregoing, your committee find that these selections were mainly, if not wholly, made contrary to the provisions of law; that the company, during the period allowed before forfeiture, had not performed the work required; that it has never constructed any sufficient harbor or breakwater; that the canal itself, as finally finished, was not "completed" and never has been completed as prescribed by the granting act; and that the company has no equities entitling it to favorable consideration. Your committee are accordingly of opinion that no act confirming these selections should be passed.

I do not know that I can dilate much further for the delectation of the Senate on this subject. I will only say that the company either have a legal or an equitable claim. Far be it from me to try to take away a single right from them. But I contend that if they want a confirmation of this title, if it can not be adjudicated, if they require relief from the United States, they should come in here and ask for it by a direct bill and not seek to get it by indirection.

There were some remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday, to which I desire to refer. He said:

As I understand it, purchasers in good faith have gone in and settled upon these lands.

I do not think there is a settler there who has purchased from the canal company.

He said:

There are villages, churches, schools, and stores on them.

I do not think there is a single village, church, school, or store on the tract; but, as I said before, I am not going to be too positive. That is my information at the present time. The Senator also said:

But, Mr. President, there is a formidable opposition here, and I understand that that opposition comes from a single source. A company of speculators dwelling in the city of Washington.

I was not aware that I was included in that category. It seems the opposition chiefly comes from me. I think that I represent the people of the State of Michigan on this question who do not wish anything unfair done to the canal company, but who do wish that this thing should be divested of all contingent questions and settled upon its merits. The great difficulty with this question is that Senators seem to try to confuse it with a thousand collateral questions. Now, here is the grave-yard episode. That grave-yard is on none of these lands. That grave-yard I have specific information in regard to.

On page 3509 of the RECORD there is the affidavit of Thomas Luxmore in regard to the village of Iron River, and it would be made to appear that that was on one of the selections of the canal company. It is an even section, Mr. President, on land never claimed by the canal company, entered by D. C. and Alexander Mackinnon in 1878 or 1879, located with supreme court warrants as private cash entry. Another is Jerome B. Schwartz, who makes an affidavit in regard to Crystal Falls. The town site of Crystal Falls was located as a private cash entry, never belonged to the canal company, and was never questioned as to title. The grave-yard was on section 24, an even section, a half mile from the village of Iron River, and was entered by John McDonald. It was patented to him in 1883, and 10 acres were sold to Iron River village for cemetery purposes. It was always open to cash entry, as determined by Secretary Lamar in the case of Picard vs. Cammin.

What I contend is that this subject should be considered independent of any collateral question. I am sure that I am willing to treat the canal company fairly, but I do object most decidedly to this nebulous legislation; I object to voting upon a question of fact regarding which we are ignorant, and which from the very nature of the case we must remain in ignorance of until it is reported by some special or general committee who have examined the case.

The people of our country are watching this kind of legislation, and we are now passing what they consider a beneficent bill for the forfeiture of railroad land grants, but if we encumber it by absurd conditions and confirm grants that never had a hundredth part of the merit of the railroad grants, they will claim that Ephraim is given to his idols, and they must let him alone.

They will claim that wealth has privileges that poor men have not, and I ask the Senate to stamp out this and all similar amendments in the interest of the people, not only of Michigan but of the United States, and give the canal company all the rights they can claim under the law, and if there are any equities concede them also, but not to encumber this bill with amendments of this character.

Mr. DOLPH obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair, at 1 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.). Before the Senator proceeds with his remarks, the Chair will take occasion to announce that the regular order of business at 2 o'clock will be the Bureau of Animal Industry bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to inquire before proceeding whether the Senator from Michigan intends to ask the Senate to proceed with that bill this afternoon.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that it be informally laid aside, reserving all rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the animal-industry bill will be laid aside informally so as to continue with the consideration of the pending bill after 2 o'clock.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the pending amendment further. I have said all that I deem necessary in regard to it.

Referring to the remarks which have just fallen from the lips of the Senator from Michigan, I wish to say that from my standpoint I can not see how anybody who is disposed to deal fairly and honestly with people who have gone into possession of this land can object to the amendment which I have proposed to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. It simply leaves these lands as public lands from the date when the State of Michigan released them to the General Government. But I have desired at some stage of this discussion to submit some general remarks upon the question of the public lands and land-grant forfeitures, and as I may not be able to be present to-morrow I will take this opportunity to submit them.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment to make a suggestion? The Senator has expressed a doubt of his ability to be present to-morrow. It would seem to me that it might be quite well to determine, for the information of all Senators, whether the Senate will be in session to-morrow; and I should like, with his permission, to move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DOLPH. I give way for that motion.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HOAR. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, it has been freely charged upon this floor and elsewhere that the Republican party is responsible for the land-grant policy, and that under its administration the public lands were squandered. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], in his speech recently upon the President's message, went out of his way, as it appeared to me, to repeat the charge, and the distinguished statesman who presides over the deliberations of the legislative body which meets at the other end of this Capitol, in an article published in the Forum for October last, thus formulated the charges:

The foundations of the existing system, under which immense landed estates have been acquired by foreign and domestic corporations and syndicates, were laid by the Republican party, and the fraudulent practices which have despoiled the public domain of its most fertile and valuable sections were begun and continued while Republican officials alone were charged with the duty of enforcing the laws and protecting the interests of the Government and people. Even now, when the magnitude of the evil is almost universally recognized, and the demand for immediate reform is urgently pressed by the homeless labor of the country, the Republican Senate either refuses to act at all or proceeds slowly and reluctantly to the consideration of the subject. On the other hand, the Democratic House has been earnest and active in its efforts to secure such changes in the laws as will dedicate the public lands to actual settlers under the homestead law, and has even gone so far as to amend its rules in order to give such measures preference over other business.

It has passed bills forfeiting and restoring to the Government, for the benefit of actual settlers, more than 100,000,000 acres of land, only a part of which has been concurred in by the Senate; and it has passed and sent to the Senate a bill to repeal the timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land laws, under which most of the great frauds were committed. The course of the Interior Department under the direction of the Democratic Secretary and Commissioner of the Land Office is familiar to the country, and need not be commented upon here. It has been uniformly in the interest of a faithful and honest administration of the law in a spirit of friendship for the bona fide settler and claimant and hostility to the fraudulent adventurer and speculator.

Mr. DOLPH. These are amazing statements to come from such a source. There is not a charge here made, directly or indirectly, against the Republican party or against the Senate that is not contradicted by facts so recent that the merest tyro in our history should be familiar with them; and the settlers upon the public domain in the public-land States will never be made to believe that the administration of the public-land laws under the late Commissioner of the General Land Office was in their interest.

The existing system here referred to, under which it is alleged that the foundations have been laid for large landed estates in foreign and domestic corporations, if it means anything, means the land-grant policy, and the charge is in substance that the Republican party is responsible for that policy. The writer then proceeds to charge that while the House of Representatives have been earnest and active for the reform of the land laws the Republican Senate has either acted reluctantly or refused to act at all.

I propose to examine these charges and to contrast the history of the administration of the public-land laws under Republican rule with the history of their administration by the Democratic party, both prior to March 4, 1861, and since March 4, 1885; and I am willing that the parties should be judged by the record they have made.

In a speech in the Senate on the 3d of July, 1884, upon the bill to forfeit the unearned land grant to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, I reviewed the legislation concerning the public lands and the origin and history of the land-grant policy. My then colleague in the Senate had previously made a speech in which he had substantially made the charges repeated by Mr. CARLISLE, and had said that for a period of sixty years prior to 1861 the public lands were regarded as a sacred trust and administered in the interest of the people. Answering this statement I then said:

I have been curious enough to trace to some extent the origin and history of the land-grant policy and the history of legislation concerning the public lands to see what grounds exist for the claim that up to 1861 the public lands were "regarded as a sacred trust and were administered in the interest of the people," and I assert without fear of successful contradiction that an examination of the history of Congressional legislation concerning the public lands will show that the administration of the public domain by the Republican party, as compared with any previous administration, has been wise and judicious, in the interest of the settlers and of the public, and has been free from most of the mistakes and abuses which are to be found in the administration of the public lands during almost every previous administration.

The first act of Congress providing for the disposition of the public lands was an act of the Continental Congress, passed August 14, 1776, offering to receive and make citizens of deserters from the British army, and tendering each deserter fifty acres of unappropriated land in some one of the States. And from that date for a period of three-quarters of a century, running through the statutes of the United States is a series of laws, probably a thousand in number, authorizing the disposition of the public domain other than for cash, or by preemption or homestead methods, including donations to States and to associations and persons for a great variety of objects.

I find in what is known as the report of the public-land commission the following table, showing the disposition of the public domain prior to June 30, 1880:

"The disposition of the public domain from its origin to June 30, 1880, is estimated at 547,754,483 acres, partially accounted for under the following items:

"And various amounts disposed of under special acts, to be found in the Statutes at Large."

It was many years before the experience of the Government in attempting to dispose of the public lands led to the adoption of an efficient system. Instead of the laws being administered in the interest of the settler the policy of the Government for many years was to prevent entries upon the public lands until after their sale by the Government.

I quote the following from an article upon the public lands of the United States in a work recently published:

"Meanwhile a new difficulty was to be met, and force was necessary. Gallatin recalls in his correspondence with Jefferson that from 1783 to 1786 immigration into the territory north of the Ohio was encouraged by the peacefulness of the Indians, and that a company was kept going up and down the Ohio from the Pennsylvania line to Cincinnati burning every cabin and in some instances laying down or burning the fences. This operation had to be repeated, and he knew of persons whose cabins were burned and settlements destroyed three times."

In 1785 an unsuccessful attempt was made to dispose of public lands through the States. In 1787 power was given to the board of treasury to move about the United States and sell surveyed lands at pleasure. By the act of May, 1800, an attempt was made to systematize the method of disposing of public lands. Land districts were created and the appointment of registers and receivers was provided for. Provision was made for the sale of surveyed lands at public vendue at not less than $2 per acre, one-fourth of the purchase-money to be paid down and one-fourth annually thereafter for three years. Under this system excessive purchases were made. The purchasers, or at least a large proportion of them, failed to meet the deferred payments. The lands reverted to the Government incumbered by tenants. Then Congress was flooded with applications for relief, and from 1800 to 1824 hardly a year passed without a relief act, suspending or mitigating the general provisions of the law affecting such lands.

In 1828, under the relief laws, 4,168,941 acres had been relinquished, discharging $13,778,347.37 of debt, and in 1850 the debt was wholly discharged. In 1835 the public lands became an object of wild speculation. In 1834 the sales amounted to $4,800,000; in 1835 to $14,700,000, and in 1836 to $24,800,000. The receipts for the lands consisted largely of notes of irresponsible banks. Land speculators organized a "bank," got it appointed a deposit bank if they could, issued notes, borrowed them, and bought land; the notes were deposited, they borrowed them again, and so on.

In due time the crash came, and nearly all the best lands in the market were controlled by companies or single proprietors who had purchased them for purposes of speculation. Under this state of things it became impossible to restrain settlers within the limits of surveyed lands. The population pressed beyond the surveyed limits to find lands suitable for homes not monopolized by speculators, and some measure became necessary to recognize these settlements and to give them priority of right. This was the origin of the pre-emption law. Up to the year 1840 the privilege of pre-emption was generally conferred by special laws of a temporary nature—relief bills, in fact—applying to a certain class of settlers. The pre-emption act of 1841 and supplementary act of 1843 conferred the right of pre-emption upon all qualified settlers under the act, but the right of pre-emption was confined to surveyed lands, and it was not until 1853 that the right of pre-emption was extended to unsurveyed lands.

From a very early period the public lands after they were surveyed were sold at public sale at dates fixed by law or by the proclamation of the President. By the act of March 3, 1803, providing for the disposition of lands belonging to the United States south of the State of Tennessee, the President was authorized to make public proclamation of the sales, fixing therein a day or days for the same to take place, and such sales were to be made under the direction of the governor of Mississippi Territory, the surveyor of the lands and the register of the land office, the sales to take place where the land offices are "kept." By the act of April 24, 1820, it was provided that the public sales authorized thereby should be kept open for two weeks and no longer. No lands could be entered at private sale unless they had first been offered at public sale. This method of disposing of the public lands was kept up until the Republican party came into power.

It will be seen at once that under this system the choice lands were sure to be purchased by speculators. At the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, then a member of the House, introduced into that body a bill for the protection of settlers on the public domain, intended to give the settler ten years' preference over the speculator. The bill was as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of September, A. D. 1858, no public lands shall be exposed to sale by proclamation of the President until the same have been surveyed and the return thereof in the land office for at least ten years."

The bill was defeated by 78 votes against it to 73 in favor of it, only nine Democrats voting for the bill. Again, on the 20th of January, 1859, to the House bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, relating to pre-emptions, Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, moved to add the following section:

"Be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no public lands shall be exposed to sale by proclamation of the President unless the same shall have been surveyed and the return of such survey duly filed in the land office for ten years or more before the sale."

The amendment was opposed by the Democratic party, and especially by Democrats residing in the Southern States, and a motion was made to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, a reference that would have been its certain defeat. The motion was defeated by a vote of 92 to 90, and the amendment carried by yeas 97, nays 81, all the members except one voting against it being Democrats. But the bill as amended was defeated by a vote of 96 nays to 91 yeas, the Republicans voting unanimously for the amendment as they did for the bill as amended. Every Southern member except two, Mr. Blair, of Missouri, and Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, voted against the bill as amended. Only eight Democrats, all of whom were of the Douglas school, voted for the bill.

On the 1st of February, 1859, House bill 72, to secure homesteads to actual settlers, which had been referred by the House to the Committee on Agriculture and reported from that committee January 26, 1859, came up for action. A motion to lay on the table was lost by a vote of 113 nays to 71 yeas, and the House was forced to a direct vote. The bill was then passed—yeas 120, nays 76; the Republicans, without exception, voted solidly for the bill; of the Democrats, 60 out of 98 voted against it. The bill was defeated in the Senate by Democratic opposition without a vote upon its merits.

The next session, on the 5th of March, 1860, Mr. Lovejoy, from the House Committee on Public Lands, reported the Grow bill, to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, and on the 12th of March, the same year, it was passed—yeas 119, nays 66, the Republicans voting unanimously for the bill, while all voting against it were Democrats.

On the 17th of April, 1860, in the Senate, Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, reported from the Committee on Public Lands, as a substitute for the Grow homestead bill, which had passed the House, a bill granting homesteads to actual settlers at 25 cents an acre. When the bill came up for consideration Mr. Wade moved to substitute the Grow bill for it, which motion was lost—yeas 26, nays 31; yeas all Republicans but 3.

The Johnson bill passed the Senate on the 10th of May. The House refused to concur, and on the 19th of June the conference committees came to an agreement by which the House accepted the Senate bill with some amendments, the provision of the bill requiring payment for homesteads at the price of 25 cents per acre being retained. This bill was vetoed by President Buchanan June 23, 1860, as unconstitutional and unjust and unequal in its operations and pretended benefits, and as a measure which "will go far to demoralize the people." In the Senate the veto was sustained, 19 to 9, all the Republicans present not paired with Democrats on the question voting for the bill.

On the 4th of March, 1861, Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated President of the United States, and the Republicans, now in control of both Houses of Congress, hastened to redeem the pledge contained in their platform adopted at Chicago in 1860 by enacting the homestead law.

The homestead act is now the approved and preferred method of acquiring title to public lands. It has stood the test of over twenty-two years, and was the outgrowth of a system extending through nearly eighty years, and stands as the concentrated wisdom of legislation for the settlement of the public lands. It protects the Government, it fills the States with improvements, it builds up communities and lessens the chances of social and civil disorder by giving ownership to the soil in small tracts to the occupants thereof. It was copied from no other nation's system. It was originally and distinctly American, and remains a monument to its originators.

In the same speech I endeavored to show that the land-grant policy grew out of the practice of the General Government consenting to the States levying tonnage duties for the purpose of improving harbors, and afterwards making appropriations from the national Treasury for the same purpose; that when the Constitution was adopted all the States had seacoast, and all were more or less interested in foreign commerce, and, therefore, appropriations made for harbor improvements were considered to be for the common benefit, but that when new States came to be admitted having no seacoast they complained of the inequality of such appropriations, the original conception of the power of the General Government to aid in internal improvements changed, and appropriations were made by Congress for wagon-roads, canals, and railroads. Tracing the history of the land-grant policy, I then said:

The first act of Congress granting aid to a work of this kind was passed in 1806, and was an act providing for the construction of a turnpike road, known as the Cumberland Road, at national expense, and from that time forward numerous bills for the construction of roads in the States and Territories were passed. The constitutionality of these acts was variously defended upon the ground of the powers of Congress "to provide for the common defense," "to establish post-roads," and "to pass laws for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," and on the other hand the constitutionality of such appropriations was warmly denied by leading statesmen, among others by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. But appropriations for internal improvements in great numbers were every year, included in the general appropriation bills, and in this manner received the approval of the Executive.

The following table shows the amount of appropriations for internal improvements under the different administrations mentioned:

Jefferson	$48,400
Madison	250,800
Monroe	707,621
Adams	2,310,478
Jackson	10,582,088
Van Buren	2,222,544
Taylor	1,076,500

*The act of June 2, 1864, enlarged the area within which the company might complete the quantity granted by the act of May 15, 1856.

These figures conclusively show when the land-grant policy was inaugurated and who was responsible for it. I have examined the debates upon some of the earlier bills making grants of lands to aid in the construction of railroads, and quote briefly from the remarks of some of the leading statesmen in both Houses of Congress upon the same to show what they thought of the land-grant policy and the reasons which then induced Congress to aid the construction of canals and railroads by grants of public lands.

On the 3d of May, 1848, the Senate having under consideration the bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way and a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the chain of northern lakes at Chicago, Senator Crittenden said:

"Sir, I rejoice to see a portion of the public domain applied to such a purpose as this; for I do not know a more natural or more wise purpose to which it could be applied than to improve and settle the lands themselves. * * * And in regard to the constitutional question, it is a certain and undeniable fact that there has not been a President of the United States, there has not been an administration since the formation of the Government by whom an appropriation similar to this has not been sanctioned; not one administration from Washington down to this day that has not given its sanction to such a grant. Old Colonel Zane had a grant made to him for marking out the first foot-path in Ohio, and preparing the way for settlement. If anything can be settled by precedent this has been. * * * If anything can be settled by precedent, if anything can be fixed as fundamental law by the unanimous approval of the wisest men, such men as Washington himself and such Congresses as have existed since the formation of the Constitution, this is such a question. I have no doubt myself either as to the constitutional right of Congress to make the grant or the wisdom and sound policy of such a measure."

In the same debate Mr. Benton said:

"I have been long enough here to have voted for the original grant to the State of Illinois for the purpose of connecting Lake Michigan with the Illinois River by means of a canal. When I gave that vote I did not expect to remain in these councils until the object intended to be accomplished should be attained; I did not expect the good fortune of seeing the United States made into an island by a canal connecting the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Mississippi in my lifetime. But it has been done by the aid of a grant of land to the State of Illinois, and I presume without that aid the work would hardly have been undertaken, much less been accomplished; now, however, the work has been completed, and the United States is to-day—an island.

"Leaving the Gulf of Mexico at New Orleans, or the Atlantic at New York, you may go as you choose around the United States without touching land. The result then of a grant of land to the State of Illinois by Congress has been prodigious; and even if there were no other advantageous result than the vast facilities afforded to our internal navigation, it well compensates us for parting with some acres of land over which this Government then wielded a barren scepter. I have no reason to regret that vote. I rejoice in it. * * * I do not, therefore, consider any of those grants as unprofitable; but, on the contrary, I fully concur in the opinion that a great public object is gained in the transfer of these lands from those by whom they are not cultivated to those by whom they are made productive. I shall with great pleasure vote for the bill before the Senate; and hope that the construction of the contemplated railroad will produce similar beneficial results to those effected by the canal."

Mr. Calhoun said:

"The question in this case is a very simple one. We are authorized by the Constitution to dispose of the public lands. Here is a public improvement, projected either by the State or individuals in the State through which it will pass, and by which the value of the public lands will be enhanced. If, then, it will add to the value of our lands, ought we not to contribute to it? Would we not, as individuals, thus act? This is not a novel principle. It has been acted upon for more than twenty years. The case of the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan is a striking one. There alternate sections were given to make a canal, and I suppose I can with confidence ask the Senators from that State whether the lands reserved to the United States were not disposed of readily.

"Mr. Breese (in his seat). Thousands of acres were disposed of which would otherwise have never been sold.

"Mr. Calhoun. I have seldom given a vote the result of which gratified me more than the vote which I gave on that occasion. I then presided in that chair which you now occupy and gave the casting vote. I take to myself, therefore, some share in the credit of that magnificent improvement. Indeed I do not think there is a principle more perfectly clear from doubt than this one is. It does not belong to the category of internal improvements at all. It is not a power claimed by the Government as a government. It belongs to the Government as a landed proprietor. And I will add that it is not only a right but a duty, an important duty.

"Now, what has been considered an equitable arrangement between the Government and the State which may undertake an improvement passing through the public lands? Long since it was agreed that the grant of alternate sections was a fair contribution on the part of the United States, considered as a proprietor, and from which the United States would be a very great gainer. It appears to me to be an equitable arrangement; and I doubt whether in any case, either of a canal or a railroad passing through the public lands, the United States will not be a gainer. To that extent I am prepared to go, be the road long or short; if it be long, you gain the more; if it be short, you gain the less; and you contribute in proportion to your gain."

Mr. Cass said:

"The Federal Government is a great land-holder. It possesses an extensive public domain; and we have the power under the Constitution to dispose of that domain, and a very unlimited power it is. The simple question is what disposition we may make of the public lands. No one will contend for the doctrine that we can not give them away to a State. As the Senator from Kentucky has said, every President has signed bills asserting the principle that these lands may be disposed of by the General Government without restriction as to the purpose of such disposition. We may bestow them for school purposes, or we may bestow a portion for the purpose of improving the value of the rest. What right have you to sit still and see your lands growing in value through the instrumentality of individuals without rendering any aid in furtherance of that object? It is the settlement of the lands that makes them valuable. It is the settler who converts the howling wilderness into fruitful fields. It is the labor and enterprise of the settler that has given you in the West a magnificent empire, and one which has arisen within so brief a period that it is almost incomprehensible.

"When I told the story in Europe that I had crossed the Ohio when there were scarcely 20,000 people in that country and that it now contained 5,000,000, they did not laugh in my face, to be sure, but they did not believe what I said. There is no parallel in the history of man, no such splendid tribute to human industry and enterprise, since the first man went out of the garden of Eden. It is not twenty-five years ago that I sat all night in a canoe at the head of the pond at Chicago, there being no human habitation in which we could obtain shelter from the mouth of the Illinois to the mouth of the Chicago River; and now it is one of the great highways of travel between the northern lakes and the ocean. Sir, I hope the gentlemen will put this upon its true ground, leaving out the constitutional question and taking alone into consideration what is your duty as land-holders in a new country—a country, too, which must derive its improvement from the industry and enterprise of your own population where every stroke of the woodman's ax redounds to your advantage.

"The man who sits down with his family in the wilderness to make for himself a home evinces more moral courage than the man who goes into battle. No man who has not experienced the difficulties and dangers he has to encounter can estimate them."

On the 29th of April, 1850, the Senate having under consideration Senate bill No. 22, granting the right of way and making donation of land in the State of Illinois in aid of the construction of a railroad, Mr. Douglas said:

"The bill proposes to grant the land in alternate sections, increasing the price of the other sections to double the minimum price. It is following the same system that was adopted in reference to improvements of a similar character in Ohio, Indiana, Alabama, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois in reference to her canal. It is simply carrying out a principle which has been acted upon for thirty years, by which we cede each alternate section of land and double the price of the alternate sections not ceded, so that the same price is received for the whole. These lands have been in the market from fifteen to thirty years; the average time is about twenty-three years; but they will not sell at the usual price of $1.25 per acre, because they are distant from any navigable stream or a market for produce. A railroad will make the lands salable at double the usual price, because the improvement made by the State will make them valuable. It is an old practice long sanctioned by the Government."

Mr. Clay, in the same debate, said:

"I have no doubt, I can entertain no doubt, of the right of the General Government as one of the greatest—the very greatest—of land-holding proprietors, to appropriate a portion of that land for the purpose of making the remainder more valuable and available.

"A great deal has been said about the trusteeship of the Government. It is true that all government is a matter of trust. Individual men are trustees created by Providence, bound to administer their faculties to the best advantage, not merely for themselves, but for their fellow-men. But if by the use of the term trustees it is proposed to qualify, limit, or restrain the trust so as to resemble the ordinary trusts that are created in the course of human transactions, I do not concur at all in that idea.

"The Government is a trustee for the purpose of administering the affairs of the nation according to its best judgment for the good of the whole and all the parts of the whole. With respect to the State of Illinois—and I believe the same is true to a considerable extent with reference to Mississippi and Alabama, but I happen to know something personally of the interior of the State of Illinois—that portion of the State through which the road will run is a succession of prairies, the principal of which is denominated the Grand Prairie. I do not recollect its extent exactly, but it is, I believe, about 300 miles in length and about 100 in breadth. Now, this road will pass directly through that Grand Prairie, lengthwise, and there is nobody who knows anything of that Grand Prairie who does not know that the land in it is utterly worthless for any present purposes; not because it is not fertile, but for the want of wood and water, and from the fact that it is inaccessible, wanting all facilities for reaching a market or for transporting timber, so that nobody will go there and settle while it is so destitute of all the advantages of society and the conveniences which arise from a social state. And now, by constructing this road through the prairie, through the center of the State of Illinois, you will bring millions of acres of land immediately into market which will otherwise remain for years and years entirely unsalable.

Mr. Seward said:

"What, then, is the best and highest interests of the people of the United States in regard to this domain? It is not to derive from it the highest amount of current revenue; it is not to accumulate in our coffers the highest and greatest amount of avails in the sales of the public lands which is attainable. But it is to bring them into cultivation and settlement in the shortest space of time and under the most favorable auspices. And why is this the best interest of the Government? It is because the power of the Government is increased just in proportion as population is extended over what now constitutes the public domain, and that the wealth of the Government increases in the same ratio as the increase of population, and that the taxable ability of the people for purposes of peace and war is increased by the extension of the population, and by the increase of wealth.

"I can conceive it possible that it is more profitable, more conducive to the interests of the people of the United States, even in a fiscal or purely financial point of view, to make large appropriations from this domain for the purpose of enhancing their more speedy settlement than it would be to retain them in a miserly grasp for the mere purpose of revenue. It is therefore upon the ground that the most expedient and beneficial disposition of this portion of the public lands is to devote it to the construction of public roads beneficial to all the people of the United States, as well as to the States which are immediately traversed by it, that I am in favor of the principle of this bill and of all similar bills which are properly guarded in their provisions, and shall give them my most cordial and effective support. I hope that the bill will be passed."

On the 27th of June, 1864, discussing the Northern Pacific Railroad bill, Mr. Hendricks said:

"The bill before the Senate proposes to encourage the construction of a very important railroad to connect the waters of Lake Superior with the waters of the Pacific Ocean. Everybody can see at a glance that it is a work of national importance. It proposes to grant lands in a northern latitude where, without the construction of a work like that, the lands are comparatively without value to the Government. No person acquainted with the condition of that section of the country supposes that there can be very extensive settlements until the Government shall encourage those settlements by the construction of some work like this. I do not think that a work of such national importance ought to be embarrassed in its passage through this body and through the House of Representatives by amendments proposing works that are comparatively local."

The bill granting lands to the Oregon Central Railroad Company was passed May 4, 1870. At that time Hon. J. S. Smith was Representative in Congress from Oregon. He was then and is now one of the ablest and most influential men in his party in the State of Oregon. While that bill was under consideration in the House, Mr. Smith said:

"I want to pass this bill to-day and I do not care to make a speech. But I trust I shall have the attention of the House while I make a very brief statement. I wish, however, to say just this in reference to the matter: That this bill is in the interest of settlers or prospective settlers on the public lands through which this road is designed to pass. The road will be about one hundred and thirty miles long. Fifty miles of that distance the country is settled; for the remainder of the distance it is not settled, and is not susceptible of settlement unless means of communication through it such as are proposed by this bill shall be provided. The road ought to extend farther up the Willamette Valley.

"The bill introduced by me provided for one the whole length of the valley, and I had hoped to have it passed in that form. The committee failed to report in favor of an extension of the branch southerly, and I accept of what they have reported. A short road is better than none. The Willamette Valley, which contains two-thirds of the population of the State of Oregon, has no outlet to the sea but by the Columbia River. That river flows across the north end of this Willamette Valley. On the west, between that valley and the sea, a mountain range extends along its whole length. Through this range of mountains to the mouth of the river we have no road of any kind.

"We want this road to give us an outlet to the sea at all seasons; and we want to open up the pass we have found through these mountains to the settlement. It is not a question whether by the passage of this bill this land shall be withdrawn from settlement, but the question is whether by the passage of this bill you will open up to settlement a region of country which otherwise never would be settled. It is a question whether it shall be occupied by settlers under the provisions of this bill or whether it shall remain a wilderness in the future as in the past, whether it shall be the home of a busy, thriving population, or continue to be the home of the elk and the bear.

"For twenty-five years, Mr. Speaker, this land has been open to settlement, first, under a donation law, and now under the homestead law; and yet no man has gone there to settle. No white men ever went there until they went to find this pass for a railroad to the sea. The red man never lived there. It is a forest, an Oregon forest, such as is found nowhere else, perhaps, in the world. And no settler will ever go there unless there is a railroad through the pass connecting this Willamette Valley with the sea. In that event some of the smaller valleys will be opened to settlement. The lands are rich; the timber is abundant; it is valuable. But the land and the timber would remain in the condition they now are for a hundred years to come if this road is not built.

"I have a letter in my hand from one of my constituents who settled in one of the valleys in the same mountain range further south, who has lived on this land for eleven years and has had a family grow up around him on it. His land is still unsurveyed; he can not have schools; he can not perfect his title; he is living there under the homestead law; is unwilling to remain and does not dare to go away for fear of losing his land. No man with a knowledge of the condition of the country and its future prospects would ever settle there in the absence of this railroad. Now, this grant is a limited one. It is barely sufficient to secure the objects in view; and I will state this, that every man in Oregon of both parties, whether along the line of this road or elsewhere, is in favor of this particular bill, and the man who votes against it here will do that people an injustice and a wrong."

Again:

"Mr. SMITH, of Oregon. * * * Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has remarked in his very remarkable speech that there was no Democrat on the floor of this House who would dare to support land grants. I claim to be as good a Democrat as the gentleman from Indiana, and I am happy to be able to say that distinguished Democrats from that State who are as well acquainted with the public sentiments of the people of Indiana as that gentleman himself will vote in favor of this bill and they will receive the approbation of their constituents for so doing. This is not a party question, and it can not be made such. This policy really originated with the Democratic party. The first land grant of any magnitude ever made in aid of internal improvements was made for the benefit of the State of Indiana, represented in part by the gentleman who moves to refer this bill. The Wabash and Erie Canal was constructed under just such a grant as is asked for this railroad in the State of Oregon. The first railway grant was to the State of Illinois, and the bill was introduced by Stephen A. Douglas, and supported by a majority of both parties in the House and in the Senate.

"Mr. VOORHEES. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

"Mr. SMITH, of Oregon. Yes, sir.

"Mr. VOORHEES. Two or three years ago, when the Northern Pacific Railroad Company had forfeited its charter by the lapse of time, and consequently the entire grant of lands that the Government had made to it, the charter was revived and the land grant insured to them by an act that passed the House with but six Democrats voting against it.

"Mr. BECK. On the 1st day of July, 1868.

"Mr. SMITH, of Oregon. I am very glad to hear that. I wish to say one other thing in this regard. At least one, and I think more than one Democratic national convention incorporated in its platform a plank in favor of such grants. And yet the gentleman says that no Democrat can vote for a land grant."

Mr. President, I have referred to these earlier grants of land to aid in the construction of canals and railroads, not for the purpose of condemning the Democratic party for inaugurating, or of excusing the Republican party for continuing the land-grant policy, but for the purpose only of showing that if, as some contend, that policy was wrong, the Republican party is not responsible for its origin. I do not condemn the policy. Looking at the great results which have flowed from it, I am ready to defend it. I believe that the most sanguine hopes of the authors of the policy and of its eminent supporters in Congress, among whom were Douglas, Benton, Calhoun, and Cass, have been more than justified. Sir, even now, with the light of experience, if I could claim for the Republican party the inauguration of the policy by which our vast territory has been made accessible and opened up to the landless for homes, and has been transformed from a wilderness to prosperous States and Territories, I should not hesitate to make the claim.

I need not add to the foregoing. Instead of the Republican party being responsible for the land-grant policy, or having laid the foundation, under which large landed estates have been acquired by foreign and domestic corporations, it appears that from the beginning of the Government until the Democratic party was hurled from power in 1861 the policy of that party was to obtain a revenue from the public lands; that it offered them to speculators first at public sale as soon as they were surveyed, and if they were not sold, then at private entry in any required quantity; that it steadfastly resisted every effort to change the law and the practice of the Government so that settlers should have an opportunity to purchase the public lands before they were offered to speculators; and that the very first general law which was passed by which settlers in possession of the public lands at the time they were offered at public sale were preferred as purchasers, the pre-emption law, was passed under a Whig administration in 1841.

It further appears that the Democratic party steadfastly resisted the passage of the homestead law, which has now become the subject of so much praise from Democratic orators and statesmen; that it made numerous canal grants, and during a period of eleven years immediately preceding the accession of the Republican party to power it made forty-seven land grants to aid in the construction of railroads, while under the entire administration of the Republican party but forty-four railroad land grants were made, and of these twenty-nine were of small amounts to aid in the extension or completion of roads which had already received grants under a Democratic administration.

To meet the force of this showing our Democratic friends say, "But the grants which were made under Democratic administration were made to the States, while the grants which were made under Republican administration were made to corporations." Assuming that there is a difference in principle or in practical effect between a grant made to a State, to be turned over to a corporation to aid in the construction of a particular road or other internal improvement, and a grant made directly to a corporation, this is a mere subterfuge. A fair illustration of the practical working of the system of grants to States is afforded by the grants made to the State of Oregon to aid in internal improvements. Several grants were made to that State to aid in the construction of wagon-roads which were named in the granting acts. They were at once transferred by the State to wagon-road companies. The certificates of the governor to the completion of the roads were made the evidence of such completion upon which the Interior Department was to act in the certification of the lands. Notwithstanding the whole matter was within the control of the State it is now claimed by the State that the roads were not constructed, and that the certification of the lands has been obtained by fraudulent means. So important was the matter deemed that it was recently made the subject of a message to Congress from the Chief Executive of the nation.

A grant was made to a company to be thereafter designated by the State, a company not in being, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland to the southern boundary of the State. A company was formed and the State designated it to receive the grant. Another grant was made directly to the Oregon Central Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland to McMinnville, with a branch to Astoria. Every citizen of Oregon knows that there has been no practical difference in the administration and disposal of these lands, or if there has been it has been in favor of the grants made directly to the companies.

When grants came to be made to aid in the construction of railroads in Territories, as was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day, the Territorial governments being mere creatures of Congress it was natural that the grants should be made directly to the corporations.

But, sir, the land-grant legislation is not the only questionable legislation concerning the public lands. In 1854, under the law and the practice of the Government all the surveyed lands had been offered at public sale and were subject to private entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre, the minimum price. This was not satisfactory to speculators, and a Democratic Congress, under a Democratic administration, passed what was known as the graduation act, by which the price of all the public lands which had been in the market for ten years and upwards was reduced to from 12½ cents to a dollar an acre. Although the act was repealed as soon as the Republican party came into power, during the eight years that it remained in force, from 1854 to 1862, there were disposed of to speculators, at an inadequate price, 25,696,519 acres of land—land which should have been reserved for settlers.

But of all the questionable legislation in regard to the public lands, of all the unguarded legislation, the swamp-land grants are the worst. The first swamp-land act was passed on the 2d of March, 1849, by which, to aid the State of Louisiana in constructing the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp lands, there was granted to her all such lands within her borders. This grant was made two days before President Taylor was inaugurated. The next grant was made September 28, 1850, under President Fillmore's administration, it is true, but by a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House. At least the organization of the House was Democratic, the Free-Soil Democrats, I believe, six in number, holding the balance of power.

The next swamp-land act, the act of 1854, which provided for the payment to the States money in lieu of lands which had been entered for cash and scrip in lieu of lands which had been entered by land-warrants, was passed under President Pierce's administration. The next act was that of March 2, 1857, by which there were confirmed to the States which had undertaken to make their own selections of swamp lands all the lands which had been selected by them where the lists of selections had been filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whether they were swamp lands or not, and that and the act of 1860, by which the swamp-land acts were extended to Oregon and Wisconsin, were passed under the administration of James Buchanan.

By the act of March 2, 1849, as I have said, to aid the State of Louisiana in reclaiming the swamp and overflowed lands which were unfit for cultivation, there were granted to her all the swamp lands within her borders, to be selected by deputy surveyors in the field, the proceeds to be exclusively applied to the reclamation of the lands; and it was provided that when the deputy surveyors had made selections of these lands and they were approved by the surveyor-general, the lands should be segregated and set over to the State by the Secretary of the Treasury. By the first section of the act of September 28, 1850, this grant was extended to the State of Arkansas, and by a subsequent section of the act to all the swamp-land States, with the same provision that the proceeds should be exclusively applied to the reclamation of the lands. But it was provided in the act that the Secretary of the Interior should approve the lands to the States. The Secretary of the Interior thereupon notified the governors of the several States and the surveyors-general of the several States that the States might either select the lands themselves in the field or they might select them from the field-notes and maps of the surveys. Most of the States elected to make their own selections, and proceeded to select not only the swamp lands but lands which were not swamp lands in fact.

In the mean time the General Government had gone on selling these lands which were not swamp, and possibly some which were; and in 1854 an act was passed by Congress by which it was provided that patents should issue to persons who had bought swamp lands from the General Government, but that in lieu of those lands the States should receive the cash which had been received for them by the General Government where lands had been sold for cash and scrip where they had been entered by warrants.

In 1857, large amounts of land having been listed by the States, claimed as swamp lands, the lists having been filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and a controversy having arisen as to whether they were swamp in fact, Congress by an act confirmed to the States all the lands which had been selected, whether they were swamp or not.

I present a table showing the amount of lands claimed by the several swamp-land States as swamp lands, the amounts which have been approved to them by the Secretary of the Interior, the amounts which have been patented to them, the amounts of indemnity they have received in money and land, and, for the purpose of comparison, a table showing the area of those States.

From these tables it appears that a very large proportion of the area of the swamp-land States has been claimed as swamp lands. For instance, Florida, with an area of 37,555,200 acres, claimed as swamp land under the act of September 28, 1850, 20,239,550.45 acres. There has been approved to the State 16,269,750.09.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, for he knows these facts better than I do?

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to inquire of the Senator in what way it is that the Government came to approve to the State so large a proportion of the lands selected as swamp lands, unless they were found to be so as a matter of fact? I understand that the entire selections by the State amount to about 20,000,000 acres, more than half the surface of Florida, and that the Government has approved 16,000,000 acres as swamp land.

Mr. DOLPH. Florida claimed nearly four-sevenths of the entire area of the State as swamp land.

Mr. BLAIR. How does it happen that the Government approved to the State this large amount, 16,000,000 acres, four-fifths of the entire amount claimed, when but a small amount of it was as a matter of fact swamp land? How is that accounted for?

Mr. DOLPH. I will explain that in one moment, as soon as I can conclude the statement and give the figures in regard to two or three of these swamp-land States.

As I said, out of a total area of 37,555,200 acres, Florida claimed 20,239,550.45 acres. There have been approved 16,269,750.09 acres. There have been patented to her 15,994,890.08 acres. She has received as indemnity in money $67,045.68; as indemnity in land, 93,346.07 acres; and she has had patented to her as indemnity lands 56,306.50 acres.

The State of Louisiana, under the two acts of March 2, 1849, and September 28, 1850, with an area of only 31,180,800 acres, claimed under the act of March 2, 1849, 11,206,314.04 acres, and under the act of September 28, 1855, 554,459.51 acres. There have been approved to her 8,707,111.04 acres under the first act, and 251,374.74 under the second act, and she has received as indemnity in money $46,186.26 and in land 27,947.31 acres.

It will thus be seen that the State of Florida claimed nearly four-sevenths of her entire area as swamp lands; that there has been approved to her nearly one-half of her entire area; and I have been informed that all these lands have been turned over by the State to railroad corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, and that the proceeds of none of them have been applied to the reclamation of the lands.

Scarcely less striking are the figures in regard to the State of Arkansas. With an area of 34,464,000 acres she has claimed as swamp lands 8,655,210.10. There have been approved to her 7,659,619.13 acres.

All the States, up to the 1st of December last, had claimed as swamp lands 78,110,877.44 acres, there had been approved to them 58,826,545.70 acres, and they had received as indemnity $1,511,518.82 in money, and in land 852,172.16 acres.

Greater frauds have been perpetrated under these swamp-land grants than under all the other laws which have been passed for the disposition of the public lands. The lands granted were, many of them, the very best lands in the States.

I will now answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire. All the swamp-land States have received large amounts of lands under these grants, which were not swamp in fact. As I have said, under the act of 1857 there was confirmed to the States the lands which had been selected and claimed as swamp lands, whether swamp or not. And since that time, if we are to believe the present and past officers of the General Land Office, larger amounts of land have been fraudulently claimed and on false ex parte testimony certified to the States which elected to make their own selections of swamp lands than were confirmed to the State by the act of 1857. More than that, few of the States have applied the proceeds of these lands to the purposes for which the grants were made.

Mr. BLAIR. Upon that point, in regard to the selection, do I understand that it has been at the choice of the State to select and to designate the swamp lands, if she so chose, or was the investigation as to the character of land primarily one by the Government? In what way is it that the false testimony which is the foundation of the fraud comes to be taken as true by the General Government and this approval of the selection of the swamp lands actually made? Who is guilty?

Mr. DOLPH. I stated a moment ago that under the act of March 2, 1849, granting swamp lands to the State of Louisiana, it was provided that the deputy surveyors should make selections of these lands in the field, and when they were certified to by the surveyor-general of the State and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury—I believe then the General Land Office had not been organized—that should be evidence of the title. Under the act of September 28, 1850, they were to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior; the Secretary of the Interior notified, by a circular from his office, the governors of the respective States, as well as the surveyors-general of the States, that the States might have their election to take the lands as they were surveyed according to the field-notes of the surveys and the plats, that is to say, to take the lands which were stated in the field-notes to be swamp and to come within the character of swamp lands as designated by the act, or they might select them themselves in the field. Most of the States elected to make their own selections. By regulations if they were selected in the field the States were required to present to the Secretary of the Interior a list of the lands which were claimed and ex parte affidavits showing the character of the lands. I understand that for many years the Secretary of the Interior took the ex parte statements as true.

A large amount of lands was secured by the States by making claims for lands which were not swamp in fact and presenting false ex parte affidavits as to the character of the lands.

Mr. BLAIR. Now I understand the plan by which this was accomplished; but what authority had the Secretary of the Interior, when a statute required him to select these lands, to deputize that power of selection to the adverse claimant, that is to the State, and to act upon the evidence presented by the other party? Was there anything in the statute which authorized the issuance of such a circular, or was it a dereliction of duty on the part of the officer of the United States?

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose that the statute which empowered the Secretary of the Interior to select these lands contemplated that he must do it through agents, and I have no doubt that the statute conferred authority upon him to select the lands in either of the ways mentioned; but the fault was that the regulations which were made, the plan which was adopted for the selection of these lands, was not sufficient to prevent fraud. It was of the same character of all legislation concerning the public lands at that time.

Mr. BLAIR. But I understand the Senator that it is still a matter of doubt whether the actual fault was on the part of the officer of the Government of the United States or was in the party who was to be benefited by the selections.

Mr. DOLPH. The only fault that can be attributed to the General Government, I think, is that the legislation was loose; the regulations were not efficient. The fraud undoubtedly was on the part of the States in selecting the lands.

In striking contrast with this legislation is the history of the administration of the public lands by the Republican party. Scarcely had it come into power when it repealed the graduation act, under which nearly 26,000,000 acres had passed into the hands of speculators at a grossly inadequate price. One of the first laws passed by the Republican party after it came into power was the homestead law, by which millions of free homes have been furnished to citizens, by which our public domain has been settled and made valuable, and which by its beneficent provisions has so commended itself to popular favor that the late Secretary of the Interior was loud in its praise; a measure which, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], was passed in spite of Democratic opposition during the administration of President Buchanan and vetoed by him.

Although the law which authorized the offering of land at public auction and afterwards at private sale continued upon the statute-book, the Republican party discontinued the practice in the interest of settlers. It is true that it continued the Democratic policy of grants to aid in the construction of railroads, but instead of confining its grants to the States where the lands were required for settlers, and which were thickly settled and already had the means of transportation, it turned its attention to the wilderness beyond the Mississippi, to the then inaccessible portion of our public domain, and inaugurated a policy by which that wilderness has been settled and transformed into a productive country and the public lands have been made valuable. It bound the Atlantic and Pacific coasts together with bonds of steel, and their people with stronger bonds, the ties of commercial and social intercourse.

I now turn my attention to another matter referred to by Mr. CARLISLE in the article from which I quoted, a comparison of the attitude and record of the House of Representatives and of the Senate upon the bills to repeal the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws, and upon the forfeiture bills.

At the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress the House sent to the Senate a bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal the pre-emption, the timber-culture, and the desert-land laws. It passed the House June 25, 1884. It was referred to the Senate Committee on Public Lands some days later. As will be remembered, Congress adjourned on the 7th of July of that year, rendering it impossible to consider and act upon the bill in the Senate during the first session. The bill as it came to the Senate had been very carelessly drawn. There was not a section of it that would have answered the purpose for which it was intended. The Senate committee remodeled the bill, made it effective for the purposes intended, and provided for the saving of the rights of persons who had already instituted claims under these laws, reported it back to the Senate, and on my motion it was taken up and pressed to final consideration, and passed the Senate on the 13th day of February, 1885.

The best evidence of the fact that the bill as reported from the Senate committee and as it passed the Senate was an improvement upon the House bill is the fact that when the House came to act upon the measure during the Forty-ninth Congress they adopted the bill as it passed the Senate. That bill, as I have said, passed the Senate on the 13th day of February, 1885. Congress adjourned on the 4th of March, but no attempt was made, if my recollection serves me, to secure a committee of conference in the House, or to consider the amendments made by the Senate, and the bill failed for want of action on the part of the House.

At the next Congress, the Forty-ninth Congress, on the first day when the introduction of bills was in order in the Senate, I introduced the bill as it had passed the Senate at the previous Congress, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. In the mean time information had been received by the committee which led its members, or a majority of them, to believe that the desert-land act should be amended and should not be repealed in toto, and in that opinion the Secretary of the Interior concurred.

There had also been a change in the General Land Office. There was a new Commissioner. He signalized his accession to office with the assertion that the settlers who were claiming lands under the pre-emption law were robbers of the public domain, and one of the first official acts of his administration was the suspension in certain districts of the issue of patents for pre-emption claims. Jurisdiction and power was assumed to determine conclusively and without an appeal to the courts (either upon the report of special agents sent out for the purpose of establishing the fact that pre-emption entries were fraudulent or upon hearings instituted before the registers and receivers of the local land offices), that the final entries of settlers under the land laws were fraudulent, and to cancel them and dispose of the land to others.

The Senate committee were in receipt of complaints from every section of the country concerning the manner in which the land laws were being administered, and they believed it necessary that there should be some legislation to correct the evils complained of. To show what authority was claimed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in order that I may not be accused of misrepresenting him, I will ask the Secretary to read the portions which I have marked from the Commissioner's report for the year 1885, the first report of Commissioner Sparks.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

INVESTIGATION OF FRAUDULENT AND ILLEGAL ENTRIES.

Twenty-eight special agents have been employed during the year in the investigation of fraudulent entries and in attendance at hearings before registers and receivers in cases previously investigated and reported to this office. The time of the agents has been largely occupied in the latter way, and much of the appropriation for the protection of public lands has been expended on such proceedings. The system of ordering hearings on special agents' reports of illegal and fraudulent entries was adopted a year or two since, after having been strenuously urged by attorneys for transferees. The purpose in demanding this proceeding was apparently to embarrass the Department, to secure delays, and to make the attempt to suppress frauds difficult and expensive. At least such has been the result. No good purpose is served by it.

It is my opinion that assignees or mortgagees of homestead, pre-emption, and other entries, conditional upon acts of settlement or improvement and not transferable under the law, have no right to be heard either in place of the alleged entryman or in their own behalf, and that to permit their intervention or to recognize in any manner their assumed interest is to promote violations of law. But the rulings of the Department, I regret to say, have been to allow them.

* * * * * * *

The Government has land to donate and also to sell. The question is whether the party seeking the donation or offering to purchase has brought himself within the law and is entitled to the donation or to make the purchase. The Commissioner is to judge. He may obtain his facts by the most direct methods available. No method can be more direct, and none more conclusive, than a personal examination. The Commissioner can not in person make that examination; he must have agencies to do it. Sworn officers of the Government are provided him for that purpose. I think nothing else is required except that a sufficient number of agents should be authorized to inspect all claims and investigate all entries before patent is issued on any of them.

An act of Congress in 1843 (5 Stat., 619) authorized the Commissioner to appoint an agent to investigate alleged frauds under the pre-emption laws in the State of Mississippi, the agent to take testimony under oath, including testimony of claimants and their witnesses, and to report the testimony to the Commissioner, whose decision thereon was made final, subject alone to appeal to the Secretary.

I recommend that a similar act be passed, general in character, and that an adequate appropriation be made to carry it into effect. I have no doubt of the power of the Government to protect its own property, and none whatever of the right and expediency of its doing so. The emergency suggests that suitable authority be vested in the administrative department to secure the proper execution and enforcement of the laws.

Mr. DOLPH. It appears from this report that if the Commissioner of the General Land Office did not claim the power to set aside and cancel pre-emption entries upon the ex-parte reports of the special agents alone, he recommended legislation which would authorize him to do so, and also that he held that assignees of pre-emption claims, after the final certificate had been issued, had no right to be heard in a proceeding for the cancellation of the certificates, and that such assignments were a violation of the law and void.

I have before me an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered by Mr. Justice Davis, in the case of Myers vs. Croft, which is found in 13 Wallace's Reports, and I will ask the Secretary to read the portion of the opinion which I have marked to show how the Supreme Court agrees with the opinion of the Commissioner.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

This section, after prescribing the manner in which the proof of settlement and improvement shall be made before the land is entered, has this proviso: "And all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured prior to the issuing of the patent shall be null and void."

The inquiry is, what did the Legislature intend by this prohibition? Did it mean to disqualify the pre-emptor who had entered the land from selling it at all until he had obtained his patent, or did the disability extend only to the assignment of the pre-emption right? Looking at the language employed, as well as the policy of Congress on the subject, it would seem that the interdiction was intended to apply to the right secured by the act, and did not go further. This was the right to pre-empt a quarter section of land by settling upon and improving it, at the minimum price, no matter what its value might be when the time limited for perfecting the pre-emption expired.

This right was valuable, and independently of the legislation of Congress assignable. The object of Congress was attained when the pre-emptor went with clean hands to the land office and proved up his right and paid the Government for his land. Restriction upon the power or alienation after this would injure the pre-emptor, and could serve no important purpose of public policy. It is well known that patents do not issue in the usual course of business in the General Land Office until several years after the certificate of entry is given; and equally well known that nearly all the valuable lands in the new States admitted since 1841 have been taken up under the pre-emption laws, and the right to sell them freely exercised after the claim was proved up, the land paid for, and the certificate of entry received. In view of these facts we can not suppose, in the absense of an express declaration to that effect, that Congress intended to tie up these lands in the hands of the original owners until the Government should choose to issue the patent.

If it had been the purpose of Congress to attain the object contended for, it would have declared the lands themselves inalienable until the patent was granted. Instead of this, the legislation was directed against the assignment or transfer of the right secured by the act, which was the right of pre-emption, leaving the pre-emptor free to sell his land after the entry, if at that time he was in good faith the owner of the land, and had done nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the law on the subject.

Mr. DOLPH. On the question of the power of the Secretary of the Interior to institute proceedings in the local land offices to set aside a final certificate, I ask the Secretary to read an extract from the opinion of the court in the case of Smith vs. Ewing, reported in 11 United States Court Reports, ninth circuit (Sawyer).

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And in United States vs. Minor, lately decided by the Supreme Court (5 S. C. Reporter, 836*), it is said that when a person obtains a patent for land under the pre-emption law by "fraud and perjury," it is enough to hold that it conveys the legal title, and it would be going quite too far to say that it can not be assailed by a proceeding in equity and set aside as void if the fraud is proved and there are no innocent purchasers for value.

But whether this rule is applicable to a purchase made from a pre-emptor after entry and before patent issues may be a question. Regarding the sale of the land, however, as completed when the proof of compliance with the law is made to the satisfaction of the agents of the vendor, the register, and the receiver, and the purchase-price paid to them, my impression is that an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration from the party having the certificate of purchase takes the land and the right to the patent, purged of any fraud that may have been committed by his grantor in obtaining such certificate.

Of course, where the invalidity of the certificate is apparent on its face or is a matter of law, of which all persons are presumed to have knowledge, the purchaser would take with notice of such invalidity and be bound by it accordingly.

But be this as it may, my conclusion is that a certificate of purchase issued in due form, in favor of a pre-emptor, for land subject to entry under the pre-emption law can not be canceled or set aside by the Land Department for alleged fraud in obtaining it; and that in such case the Government must seek redress in the courts, where the matter may be heard and determined according to the law applicable to the rights of individuals under like circumstances.

Mr. DOLPH. Before the bill for the repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws came from the House at the Forty-ninth Congress the Senate committee had perfected and reported to the Senate a bill for the repeal of the pre-emption and timber-cultture laws and for the amendment of the desert-land act; but owing to the radical changes which had been made in the administration of the public-land laws by the then Commissioner, they deemed some additional legislation necessary, and inserted in the first section of the bill the following provision:

That all entries heretofore made under the pre-emption laws, on which final proof and payment have been made, and to which there are no adverse claims, and which have been sold to innocent purchasers, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the proper department officer of such sale.

They also inserted in the bill an additional section, section 8, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That in all cases under the pre-emption and homestead acts, all contests or protests on the part of the Government or any individual concerning the land to be entered shall be instituted within ninety days after the duplicate receiver's receipt is issued, and not afterwards: Provided, That whenever it shall appear upon the face of the papers returned to the Commissioner's office that a clerical error has been committed, said Commissioner shall have power to suspend such entry, upon proper notification to the claimant, through such local land office, until such error has been corrected: Provided further, That after final proof of the claimant and the issuing of the duplicate receiver's receipt, if it shall come to the knowledge of the Commissioner, before the patent has issued for the same, that fraud has entered into the title so acquired by the claimant, unless it shall appear that the land has been sold and conveyed to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, the Commissioner shall suspend the issuing of the patent for the same, and file with the United States Attorney-General notice of such suspension of the patent, with his reasons therefor; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to commence proceedings at once in the proper court, by a scire facias, bill, or information, to set aside such title. This section shall apply to all cases of suspended entries under the United States pre-emption and homestead acts: Provided, That when two years have elapsed, or shall hereafter elapse, from the date of the issuance of the receiver's receipt upon the entry of any tract of land under the homestead or pre-emption laws, and when during such period no contests shall have been instituted or protest or objection filed against the validity of such entry, the entryman shall be entitled to a patent conveying the land by him entered, and the same shall be issued to him; but this provision shall not be construed to require the delay of two years from the date of said entry before the issuing of a patent therefor.

Mr. DOLPH. It will be seen that the committee undertook to provide a remedy for settlers who were being deprived of their homes under the then administration of the land laws. The provision of the first section of the act which I have read was understood by the committee to be but a declaration of the law as it then stood and as it had been declared by the courts, and the eighth section of the bill, as reported by the committee and which has been read, was understood by the committee to be a granting of additional powers to the Commissioner and to the Secretary of the Interior to set aside the final duplicate receiver's receipt, on the ground of fraud in the first instance, and to be conclusive unless the party claiming the lands should demand a judicial investigation after his certificate had been held for cancellation by the Secretary of the Interior, in which case it was made the duty of the Government to institute suit to cancel the entry.

When the House bill came to the Senate the Senate bill was substituted for it and passed the Senate, and a conference committee was appointed upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The provisions I have referred to were the principal ones which were objected to in conference by the conferees on the part of the House. The House conferees were not willing to interfere with the Commissioner in the exercise of the power which was claimed by him to proceed by an independent investigation instituted in the local land offices to cancel final entries for fraud. Such pre emption, homestead, timber culture, and desert-land claimants had no remedy, no matter how unjustly they might be dealt with by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. There was no provision of law for compelling the attendance of witnesses or taking depositions.

No matter how false the report of the spies of the Department who were sent out to investigate their claims might be, they could not go into court to try their titles. There was no remedy until the Government had canceled their entries and the land had been settled upon by another claimant under the land laws and patent had issued from the Government.

After several conferences the Senate conferees, in order that they might not be misunderstood as to what they were willing to do, made a proposition to the House conferees in writing, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) "to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture and for other purposes," submit to the conferees on the part of the House as follows: We propose to strike out of section 1 of the Senate amendments the following words in lines 20 to 27, inclusive, and to the end of the word "sale" in line 28, to wit, "that all entries made under the pre-emption or homestead laws, on which final proof and payment may have been made and certificates issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry, and which may have been sold prior to the 9th day of June, 1886, and after final entry, to bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale."

We propose to strike out section 8 of the Senate amendments and to substitute the following:

"SEC. 8. That whenever it shall appear upon the face of the papers returned to the Commissioner's office that a clerical error has been committed, such entry may be suspended, upon proper notification to the claimant, through the local land office, until the error has been corrected; and after final proof of the claimant and the issuing of the duplicate receiver's receipt, upon any final entry under the pre-emption timber-culture, desert-land, and homestead acts, or if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that such duplicate receiver's receipt has been obtained by fraud, the Commissioner shall hold the entry for cancellation and at once notify the claimant, which action shall become absolutely final unless, within sixty days from notice thereof, the claimant or other party in interest shall appeal from the action of the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior. The decision of the Secretary upon such appeal shall in like manner be final unless such claimant or other party in interest shall within sixty days after notice thereof file with the Secretary of the Interior a written request for a judicial investigation, in which case the Secretary shall suspend further action, and file without delay with the Attorney-General of the United States notice of such suspension with his reasons therefor; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to commence proceedings at once in the proper court to cancel such entry if in his judgment such proceedings can be maintained, and if in his judgment such proceeding can not be maintained, or no proceeding shall be instituted within two years after the filing in his office of the notice of the suspension, then a patent shall be issued upon such entry: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to impair the rights of any bona fide purchaser or mortgagee of any such lands under existing laws; and all purchasers, mortgagees, and parties in interest of record shall be made parties to such proceedings, and may defend in their own right. This section shall apply to all cases of suspended entries heretofore made under the United States pre-emption timber-culture, desert-land, and homestead acts: Provided, That after the lapse of three years from the date of the issuance of the receiver's receipt upon the final entry of any tract of land under the homestead, timber-culture, desert-land, or pre-emption laws or under this act, and when there shall be no pending contest or protest against the validity of such entry, the entryman shall be entitled to a patent conveying the land by him entered, and the same shall be issued to him; but this proviso shall not be construed to require the delay of three years from the date of said entry before the issuing of a patent therefor.

We further propose to agree to the other minor amendments and changes which have been discussed in conference and practically agreed to.

J. N. DOLPH.
H. M. TELLER.
F. M. COCKRELL.

Mr. DOLPH. It will be seen that by the proposition which has just been read, the Senate conferees offered to surrender to the House almost everything in controversy except the single proposition that a pre-emption entryman should have a right to a trial in a court before his entry is canceled. This proposition was refused by the House conferees. Upon one of the reports of the disagreement made to the Senate, at the request of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], now in the chair, I made some explanation of the disagreement, as did also the colleague of the Senator [Mr. PLUMB], which I will insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

Mr. DOLPH. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, and for other purposes. We report a disagreement, and in presenting the report, I shall ask for a further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

"J. N. DOLPH,
"P. B. PLUMB,
"F. M. COCKRELL,
"Managers on the part of the Senate.

"THOS. R. COBB,
"W. J. STONE,
"H. B. STRAIT,
"Managers on the part of the House."

Mr. INGALLS. Before the request of the Senator from Oregon is disposed of, I wish he would be good enough to state the condition of the subject in the conference, and whether the differences are so radical as to probably present an issue that can not be adjusted at this session of Congress.

My reason for asking is because I receive a great many letters from people interested in the public domain as homestead settlers and pre-emption settlers, and it would concern the public, I am sure, to know whether we are likely to have any such legislation as is proposed by the bill at this session or not.

Mr. DOLPH. The differences between the managers on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House upon this bill have been quite radical, but they are differences that I think may be overcome and upon which an agreement ought to be reached.

There was contained in the first section of the bill as it passed the Senate a provision, in substance—not having the bill before me I can not give it literally—that in all cases where final proof had been made and final receiver's receipts had been issued for pre-emption claims, and such claims had been sold to innocent purchasers for valuable consideration, the patent should be issued, notwithstanding any alleged informality in the proofs of the original entryman.

There was also in the eighth section of the bill a provision upon the same subject. These provisions were strenuously objected to by some members of the Senate and by the conferees on the part of the House, and it was alleged that the effect would be to confirm fraudulent claims. The managers on the part of the Senate believe, as a majority of the Senate did, that where such lands after final proof and payment and the issuing of final certificates had passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers the title should be confirmed to them.

If I am at liberty to state what the managers on the part of the Senate have been disposed to yield in this controversy, I will state that they have been disposed to yield this provision and permit it to be stricken out, so as to leave the law in that respect precisely as it now stands, and insert in lieu a provision in section 8, as follows: "That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair any existing rights of any bona fide purchaser of any such claim under existing law."

The most important point of disagreement, after that one is disposed of, is the provision of the bill as passed by the Senate, that in cases where the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be convinced that fraud has entered into the final proofs made by an entryman under the homestead or pre-emption law, he shall suspend the issuing of patent and refer the matter to the Attorney-General, who shall cause suit to be instituted in the courts of the United States to set aside and cancel the certificate which has been issued to the entryman under the pre-emption law or homestead law, as the case may be.

The conferees on the part of the other House insist that in all cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior shall be the sole, absolute judge, and their judgment shall be based upon proceedings instituted by them in the local land offices as to whether an entry is fraudulent, and that they shall have the sole and absolute power of canceling and setting aside the entry and throwing open the land which had been settled upon, improved, and made valuable by the pre-emption and homestead claimant, to further settlement under the laws of the United States.

The conferees on the part of the Senate believe that a man who has resided for years upon a piece of public land, who has made such proofs as are required by the laws of the United States, who has paid the amount required to be paid into the Treasury for his land and received his final certificate, who has put his all into his home, should have a right to go to a court and to have there determined the question as to whether the certificate for his entry has been properly issued to him, and as to whether his land shall be taken away from him.

That is, as I understand, at present the radical point of difference between the managers on the part of the two Houses, the Senate conferees insisting that some provision shall be retained in the bill by which a man whose title is attacked in the Land Office shall have a right virtually to appeal from the action of the Interior Department or from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the courts, and to there try the question of his right to the land, the House conferees insisting that the power shall either be left where they claim it now is, or shall be vested in the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior Department to decide finally and conclusively whether such a claimant to the public lands under the laws of the United States is entitled to his land.

Mr. INGALLS. Both Houses of Congress have agreed by very large majorities that the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land acts shall be repealed, to the effect that what remains of the public domain may be left to the operation of the homestead laws for individual settlement. That, I believe, is the judgment of the country at large, and I am convinced that the Senate conferees will fail in the discharge of a great public duty if they permit adhesion to minor and unimportant details to prevent the accomplishment of this great public work. I therefore hope that the conferees will consider themselves at liberty at least, in case the issue is tendered, to allow the question of remedy for individual rights either to remain as it now is or else to provide hereafter for some method by an amendment of existing laws, so that we may have the main object accomplished before the adjournment of this session of Congress.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senate Committee on Public Lands and the Senate have had the question of the amendment of the public land laws under consideration quite as long as the other branch of Congress. Numerous bills were referred to the Senate Committee on Public Lands. They were carefully considered, and a report was made at an early day at the last session of Congress of a bill which it was supposed would answer the purposes and cover the various questions which it was thought necessary to have legislation upon. That action was afterwards reconsidered by the Senate committee, and after a careful and elaborate consideration, extending through several sessions of the committee, a measure was reported to the Senate embodying the legislation that was thought necessary on the part of the Senate Committee on Public Lands. When the House bill came over the provisions in regard to the repeal of the pre-emption law and the timber-culture act were substantially the provisions of the bill which had passed the Senate a year before, or during the last Congress, but it did not include the various matters on which it was thought by the Senate committee necessary to have legislation. Therefore, the Senate Committee on Public Lands determined to take up the Senate bill and substitute it for the House bill. The Senate bill had been pending on our Calendar for a long time.

These are not unimportant matters. I am in constant receipt of letters from almost every Western State and Territory, and so is every other member of the Committee on Public Lands; and delegations come up to the Capitol and interview the members of the Committee on Public Lands almost daily upon the question of some remedy for the existing evils growing out of the present condition of the public-land laws or the manner of their execution. Patents for pre-emption claims have been suspended in nearly all the Western States and Territories. No patents are being issued. Settlers are unable to get their titles. They can get no credit upon their claims. There is actually great suffering for want of action upon their application for title to these lands.

One provision that is objected to in section 8 is the one which provides that if at the end of two years after final proof and the issue of the final certificate of the register and receiver, there is no suggestion of fraud and no contest, a patent shall be issued. Even that is objected to by the managers on the part of the other House. Under the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate a homestead entryman will be required to reside five years upon his claim. He then must make his final proof. He then gets his final certificate. Then his papers will be hung up for two years in the General Land Office, if they choose to hold them, waiting for somebody to make a suggestion of fraud in the procurement of his title. That will be seven years from the time he goes upon his land, still the managers on the part of the other House are not satisfied with that provision, a provision which, if there is no suggestion of fraud and no contest, would compel the issuing of a patent after seven years' time.

I think any one who has given this matter attention will see that some general legislation is necessary. As far as I am concerned, I do not care to serve upon the committee of conference, but I do not wish it to be understood that the matters of difference are trivial features at all. I call attention to the fact that the bill as it passed the Senate does not involve a repeal of the desert-land act, but a modification of it only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate insist upon its disagreement and ask for a further conference.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that motion is put I wish to say a word. I have myself been for many years in favor of the repeal of the pre-emption law, not because that repeal was demanded by any powerful and overwhelming sentiment of the State which I in part represent, but because of the larger view of the situation I believed there ought to be further limitation put upon the acquisition of public land in view of its rapid absorption.

Probably there would be no trouble in agreeing upon a bill for this single purpose. In fact there is little substantial difference between the two Houses on this question.

But since this subject has been under discussion a practice has come into vogue in the administration of the General Land Office of a character which is not only threatening to existing rights under the law, but which is subversive of all rules of procedure by which the rights of property are affected, the rectification of which is of a great deal more consequence than the repeal of the pre-emption law or of the timber-culture law or both together. The proceeding by special agents, by detectives, by private inquiry, by secret inquisition, whereby titles are assumed to be set aside upon ex parte hearing, is going on to an extent which is paralyzing to the business of certain sections of the West, and which is practically destroying the right of honest pre-emptors and of honest purchasers—of a kind which, except that it is covered by the cry of fraud which has filled the public press, would be regarded as a shame and a disgrace not to be permitted to continue for one single instant longer. Every agency which cupidity, which hate, which malice and self-seeking and private revenge can suggest in man has been exerted against the honest settlers on the frontier—not, mind you, against the cattle-man, but against the individual entryman and his honest successor in interest claiming a single quarter-section of land.

I will state what recently occurred in a public hearing in a Western Territory to illustrate the character of the proceedings that are being carried on under the sanction of the Land Department's present construction of the law, when I say that the witness on the stand, who was the contestant in the pending case for a piece of land which had been valuably improved and was then in the honest bona fide occupation of the claimant, admitted that he kept a bawdy house near there, and that the special agent at whose instance he had made the contest had solicited him to make such contest and had promised him that if he would make it he should have the land under consideration, and which had been made valuable by the labor of another, as the reward for instituting the contest. That is not one case alone; it is one of hundreds of cases that are taking place all over the frontier.

So far as I am concerned there is no question of public policy involved concerning the public lands that equals in importance the one of providing that titles acquired under the land laws shall not be set aside except by that due process of law which can only be applied by the courts, in which ex parte testimony is not heard and in which rich and poor are on an equal footing.

It thus appears that at the Forty-eighth Congress the bill for the repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land acts failed to become a law by the inaction of the House; that at the Forty-ninth Congress it failed to become a law because the conferees on the part of the House would not consent to any legislation which would restrain the exercise by the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the power unlawfully asserted by him to cancel the receiver's duplicate final receipts for pre-emption entries without trial before a court or a jury.

I come now to the question of land-grant forfeitures.

The first act forfeiting a railroad land grant was the act for the forfeiture of the grant of the Iron Mountain Railroad Company, Senate bill 353 of the Forty-eighth Congress. As I understand the facts in that case, the company had not constructed its road on the line prescribed in the grant. It did not claim to have earned the land. It was desirous itself for a forfeiture of the grant in order that it might be relieved beyond question of its obligations under the granting act to the General Government.

The second forfeiture act, and the first forfeiture to which there was any opposition, was an act to forfeit a land grant made to the Oregon Central Railroad Company, an Oregon corporation. I made a speech in the Senate favoring the forfeiture, as did my then colleague.

During the Forty-eighth Congress the following land-grant-forfeiture bills were passed: The one which I have mentioned of the Iron Mountain Railroad Company, Senate bill 353, and the following House bills: House bill 3933, forfeiting the grant of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company; House bill 181, forfeiting the grant of the Oregon Central Railroad Company; House bill 7162, forfeiting the grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company. I believe, although that act was passed by the Senate with amendments, the amendments were not concurred in by the House, and the bill failed to become a law.

The following House bills were sent to the Senate and were not acted upon by the Senate: House bill 589 to forfeit the land grant of the Oregon and California Railroad Company, and House bill 7299, to forfeit certain land grants to the State of Iowa.

During the Forty-ninth Congress the following bills were passed: House bill 392, to forfeit land grants to certain Southern States; House bill 453, to forfeit the grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company. I see I was correct in supposing that the amendments of the Senate had not been concurred in by the House at the previous session, and the bill did not then become a law. House bill 3186, to forfeit the grant to the New Orleans and Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company; House bill 391, to forfeit certain lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of railroads.

At the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, on the first day on which the introduction of bills was in order, I introduced a bill to forfeit that portion of the Northern Pacific land grant between Wallula and Portland. It was duly considered by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, reported favorably to the Senate, and passed the Senate with an amendment forfeiting all the lands adjacent to the uncompleted road of that company. It was amended in the Senate to include the land adjacent to the uncompleted portion of the Cascade branch. In the House it was amended so as to include in the proposed forfeiture all the lands west of Bismarck—all the lands which had been earned by the construction of the road after the time limited in the grant. The Senate also passed a bill forfeiting certain land grants to the State of Iowa, and a bill to forfeit certain lands granted to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of wagon-roads in that State. These last bills were not acted upon in the House, and failed by the inaction of that body.

In the bill to forfeit the unearned lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, as it was reported to the Senate, there was no attempt to confirm to the company the lands which had been earned by the construction of road either before or after the time limited in the grant; but in order that there might be no possible ground for a claim that the bill in effect did confirm any lands that were not declared forfeited by it, when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] offered an amendment expressly providing that nothing in the act should prevent Congress at any future time from forfeiting any of the balance of the grant on account of any past or future breach of the conditions on which the grant was made, I accepted the amendment and it was adopted by the Senate without a dissenting voice.

The Senate offered the House then a bill to forfeit all the Northern Pacific Railroad lands which a majority of the Senate believed were forfeitable which a majority of the Senate believed it had power to forfeit or that it would be just or honest to forfeit, leaving the House free, if it believed other lands should be forfeited immediately after the passage of that bill, to send to the Senate a bill to forfeit the remainder of the grant and thus to put the Senate in the wrong if their position was the correct one.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company desired time to complete the Cascade branch, and the action of the House and of the House conferees gave them time and secured to them the lands appurtenant to that branch. In fact, there seemed from the first to be a settled determination on the part of the House conferees to come to no agreement upon the question. The bill went to the House late in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and it was with difficulty that a conference at that session was secured at all. When Congress met at the second session of that Congress no trace could be found of the bill, which was in the possession of the House, or of the House copy of the conference report, which had been signed ready to be presented, and it was not until the Senate conferees had repeatedly called the attention of the conferees on the part of the House to the matter that any action could be obtained in the House to substitute a copy for the original of the lost bill. To substantiate what I say I now ask to make part of my remarks certain proceedings in the Senate, February 2, 1887, containing certain correspondence between the Senate and House conferees on this subject.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish the Senator from Iowa would give way to me for a moment, to allow me to call up a communication just received from the House of Representatives in regard to the bill forfeiting the Northern Pacific land grant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 1, 1887.

"Resolved, That the Senate be requested to furnish the House with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2172) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, the original copy having been lost or mislaid."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the request of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to have some information as to what has been done by the conference committee, and when it was discovered that this bill had been lost. The bill has been in conference for some time. Indeed, the conference committees were appointed at the last session. I should like to know something about it, having been a member of the committee myself.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it alleged that an engrossed copy of a bill that has passed both Houses has disappeared absolutely and no trace of it can be found?

Mr. DOLPH. For the Senator's information I ask for the reading of the message.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be again read.

The message from the House of Representatives was again read.

Mr. INGALLS. That presents a very singular and novel question. I think that had better lie over.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Missouri has called for some statement in regard to the matter, and I recognize the propriety of such a statement. I, however, am not quite certain how far I am at liberty to state what has transpired between the managers on the part of the Senate and the managers on the part of the House. I should like to submit a question as to whether correspondence in regard to the loss of a bill or the possession of a bill is considered a matter proper to be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised of any special rule on the subject. The Senator can exercise his discretion.

Mr. DOLPH. That being the case, I will ask the Secretary to read——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If objection is made to the consideration of the resolution at this time, the Chair is of opinion that it must go over under the rules.

Mr. DOLPH. I would ask the Senator to yield to me to make the statement I desire to make at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas object?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not object to any statement being made; but I said the situation was novel and unprecedented and we ought not to act in haste in the matter. I therefore asked that the resolution might go over under the rules in order that we might deliberate about it.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator to withdraw his objection until he hears a statement.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. DOLPH. That being the case, I ask the Secretary to read a copy of a communication transmitted yesterday by the managers on the part of the Senate to the managers on the part of the House on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the House amendment to Senate bill 2172, a communication dated 29th January, 1887, and which has undoubtedly produced the action of the House now under consideration. I ask for the reading of the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., January 29, 1887.

"Messrs. COBB, VAN EATON, and PAYSON, managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the House amendment to Senate bill 2172:

"GENTLEMEN: We again call your attention to the matter of the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the House amendment to Senate bill 2172, a bill restoring to the United States certain lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and for other purposes.

"The record shows that the House passed the bill with an amendment July 27, 1886, and, on motion of Mr. PAYSON, it was ordered that the House insist on said amendment and ask a conference with the Senate thereon (House Journal, page 2364); that on July 28 the Speaker appointed Messrs. Cobb, Van Eaton, and PAYSON as managers on the part of the House (see House Journal, page 2378); that the Senate was notified on the same day that the House of Representatives had passed said bill with an amendment, and requested a conference with the Senate on the bill and the amendment, and had appointed Messrs. Cobb, Van Eaton, and FISHER as managers of the same on its part (see Senate Journal, page 1191); that on the next day, July 29, 1886, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, and on motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was "Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill and agree to the conference asked by the House on the said bill and amendment (see Senate Journal, page 1199).

"And that on July 30, 1886, Messrs. DOLPH, TELLER, and COCKRELL were appointed managers on the part of the Senate; and it was ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof (see Senate Journal, page 1204). Thereupon the papers were transmitted to the House (see message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, page 2450, House Journal).

"There appears (if its printed journals are correct) to have been a mistake in the message from the House in naming Mr. FISHER instead of Mr. PAYSON as one of the managers on the part of the House, and in the message from the Senate, which, so far as it relates to bill 2172, is to the effect that the Senate had disagreed to amendment of the House, asked a conference, and had appointed conferees. No further action appears to have been taken in the House, however, and the errors probably were not noticed, and it is quite possible that both are typographical errors.

"Just before the close of the session, and as soon as it could be arranged for, a meeting of the conference committee upon the bill and amendment in question was held, when, it being supposed that an agreement was impossible during the brief remaining hours of the session, it was determined without much discussion to report to the two Houses that the committee were unable to agree and to ask for a further conference. Duplicate reports were accordingly prepared by the clerk of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, and signed by the managers on the part of both Houses on the same or the succeeding day, and one copy of the report was retained by the managers upon the part of the House, and the other by the managers upon the part of the Senate. The chairman of the Senate conferees upon the same day the report was signed undertook to submit it to the Senate, but it was not received for the reason that the papers were not in the possession of the Senate. The managers upon the part of the Senate being under the impression that the House was entitled to retain the bill, and that the report should and would be first made in that body, awaited its action.

"No message having been received from the House announcing action upon the report, the Senate managers, through Mr. DOLPH, early in the present session, called the attention of the managers on the part of the House to the matter, and requested that the report should be submitted and the Senate notified. Later, being advised that if the papers could be transmitted to the managers on the part of the Senate, the report should be first submitted in that body, shortly after the holiday recess Mr. DOLPH applied to Mr. Cobb for the possession of the papers, and was informed by Mr. Cobb that he did not have the bill in his possession at the time of the conference; and also that he had mislaid the copy of the conference report delivered to the House conferees. Mr. Cobb requested to be furnished with a duplicate of the one in the possession of the managers upon the part of the Senate. The duplicate copy of the report was accordingly prepared by the clerk of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, signed by the managers on the part of the Senate and furnished to Mr. Cobb on the 11th instant, accompanied by a letter from the clerk of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, requesting on behalf of the Senate conferees possession of the bill. On the 12th instant a letter was received from Mr. Cobb, acknowledging the receipt of the duplicate report, and containing the following statement:

"'In regard to the bill S. 2172 (the Northern Pacific Railroad land-grant forfeiture bill), I have not got it in my possession, and have not had it since I reported it to the House from my committee at the last session.' Upon inquiry at the Clerk's desk in the House it was ascertained that the bill could not be found. Thereupon Mr. DOLPH requested Mr. Cobb to take the necessary steps to substitute a copy of the bill in the usual manner, and on the 13th instant addressed to him a letter renewing the request in writing, and inclosing the form of an order prepared by one of the Senate clerks, which it was supposed would answer the purpose.

"It was understood then that the matter would receive due attention without delay. Since then the managers upon the part of the Senate, through Mr. DOLPH, have repeatedly called attention to the subject and requested immediate steps to be taken to find the bill or to substitute a copy for it. But so far as we have learned no action has yet been had. Mr. Cobb's recollection that he did not have the bill at the time of the conference is no doubt correct, as the bill was not produced at the time, and the committee erred in proceeding until that was done.

"The session is drawing to a close. In our judgment it is important that an agreement should be reached by the conference committee; at all events an effort in good faith on both sides to reach an agreement should at once be made. We therefore request that as the House was last in possession of the bill, and therefore action for the purpose of substituting a copy, if it can not be found, must originate there, that you cause whatever may be necessary in the premises to be done at once in order that a report of the committee can be submitted and a further conference be had.

"Respectfully, yours,

"J. N. DOLPH,
"H. M. TELLER,
"F. M. COCKRELL,
"Managers on the part of the Senate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the unfinished business will be laid aside informally to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. I now submit a copy of a letter addressed by the clerk of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, by the direction of the Senate conferees, to Mr. Cobb, on the 11th of January.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SENATE CHAMBER, Washington, January 11, 1887.

"MY DEAR SIR: Senator DOLPH informs me that you have lost your copy of the conference report agreed upon at the last session by the conference committee on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses upon the House amendments to Senate bill No. 2172 (the Northern Pacific land-grant forfeiture bill), and desire a copy of the one delivered to the Senate conferees. I inclose you a copy signed by the conferees on the part of the Senate.

"The Senate conferees have also instructed me to ask for the possession of the bill and papers, to enable them to submit their report.

"Very respectfully,

"B. F. FLENNIKEN,
"Clerk Senate Committee Public Lands.

"Hon. T. R. COBB,
"Chairman Conferees, House of Representatives."

Mr. DOLPH. I now submit an original letter, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., January 12, 1887.

"MY DEAR SIR: The conference report received with thanks.

"In regard to the bill (Senate) 2172, the Northern Pacific land-grant forfeiture bill, I have not got it in my possession, and have not had it since I reported it to the House from my committee, at last session.

"I am yours, truly,

"T. R. COBB."

Mr. DOLPH. I now submit a copy of a letter addressed by the clerk of the Senate Public Lands Committee to Mr. Cobb, on the 13th of January.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SENATE CHAMBER, Washington, January 13, 1887.

"MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of the 12th instant, in which you state 'in regard to the bill Senate 2172 (the Northern Pacific land-grant forfeiture bill), I have not got it in my possession, and have not had it since I reported it to the House from my committee at last session,' the Senate conferees direct me to request that, as the bill should be on the House files, having been transmitted to that body on the 30th day of July last, in order that the report of the conference committee shall not be further delayed, and that an opportunity for a further conference may be secured at an early day, you take steps to substitute a copy of the bill, in the usual method, by having the House ask for an engrossed copy of the Senate bill. The chairman of the Senate conferees undertook to submit the conference report to the Senate immediately after the conference, but was not permitted to do so, as the bill was not in possession of the Senate.

"This is the occasion of the verbal and written requests which have been made to your committee for the possession of the bill.

"Very respectfully,

"B. F. FLENNIKEN,
"Clerk Senate Committee on Public Lands.

"Hon. T. R. COBB,
"Chairman Conferees, House of Representatives."

Mr. DOLPH. I also present an original letter from the clerk of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, addressed to myself.

The Secretary read as follows:

"WASHINGTON, January 21, 1887.

"MY DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry I have the honor to inform you that on January 11, 1887, by your request, I prepared, procured the signatures of the Senate conferees, and delivered to Hon. T. R. Cobb, chairman of the House conferees, a duplicate or copy of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill 2172 (the Northern Pacific forfeiture bill), and that in my letter with the above inclosure I requested possession of the bill and papers. Under date of January 12 Mr. Cobb acknowledged receipt of the report, and said 'that he had not the bill in his possession, and had not had it since he reported the same to the House from his committee at the last session of Congress.'

"The bill was not produced at the meeting of the conferees held at the room of the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

"Mr. Cobb subsequently stated to me that he did not have the bill at the conference, but that he thought Mr. PAYSON, one of the House conferees, might possibly have it in his possession.

"Very respectfully,

"B. F. FLENNIKEN, Clerk.

"Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
"Chairman Senate Conferees."

Mr. DOLPH. In addition to the facts stated in these several communications, as soon as we ascertained from Mr. Cobb and from the clerk of the House committee that the bill could not be found, I requested our Reading Clerk, Mr. Gilfry, to make a thorough search not only of the files of the Senate, but also of the RECORD, to see where the bill ought to be, and endeavor to find the bill. He informed me that he inquired at the Clerk's desk in the House, and found that they had not the bill or that the bill had been mislaid, and also that he inquired of Mr. Cobb, and Mr. Cobb informed him that he did not have the bill at the time of the conference.

I have had this correspondence read not because I desire to criticise the act of anybody, or the omission to act on the part of the managers of either branch of Congress, but simply that the facts might be known, in justice to the managers on the part of the Senate.

I understand that there is no difficulty in substituting a copy for the original bill at this stage of the proceedings. I, myself, suppose from all the indications that the bill has been mislaid, and am inclined to think probably with the report of the conference committee that was delivered to the House conferees shortly after the meeting of the conference.

This seems to be the usual method of substituting a bill, to get a certified copy from the Senate of the Senate bill and to have the House amendment by order of that body substituted for the bill as it passed the House with the amendment. I therefore renew the motion that the request of the House of Representatives be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate agree to the request of the House of Representatives.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdrew my objection for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Oregon to make a statement. If it is necessary for me to make the objection again, of course I will do that. I only withdrew it for the purpose of allowing him to make the statement which has gone on the records.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter goes over under objection.

Mr. President, I am much mistaken if this showing, instead of establishing the correctness of Mr. CARLISLE's charge against the Senate of acting with reluctance in regard to the land-grant forfeitures, does not show that the House deliberately threw away the opportunity for the forfeiture of this Northern Pacific Railroad grant until the company could earn the lands on the Cascade branch.

Now I come to the consideration of the concluding portion of Mr. CARLISLE'S statement, that the administration of the public lands under the late Commissioner of the General Land Office has been in the interest of settlers, and I assert that there never has been in the history of this country such a failure to administer the laws in accordance with their spirit and intent as there was under the administration of the late Commissioner to administer beneficent provisions of the land laws in the interest of the settler. As I have said, the Commissioner came into office with the impression publicly declared that the men who were seeking to make homes under the pre-emption laws on the public domain were robbers and thieves.

One of the very first acts of his administration was to suspend the issuing of their patents. The business of the General Land Office was retarded and obstructed; new and unusual methods were instituted for the examination of the titles of settlers on the public lands; confusion of titles prevailed; consternation among the settlers was created; their credit was destroyed, and in thousands of instances they were robbed of their homes.

Under our theory of government the powers of government are divided between the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments. The legislative department makes the laws; the judicial department alone has power to construe them, and it is the duty of the executive department to execute them. But I find that on June 2, 1886, the following order was made and published and was made a part of the next report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1886.

To the Registers and Receivers United States Land Offices:

GENTLEMEN: The repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws being now the subject of consideration by Congress, all applications to enter lands under said laws are hereby suspended from and after this date until the 1st day of August, 1886, and you are hereby directed to receive no filings or new applications for entry under said laws during said time.

WM. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

Approved:

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.'"

Here we find the Commissioner of the General Land Office assuming the power of legislation, suspending for a definite period laws passed years before by Congress, cutting off the rights of the people to secure titles to the public lands under existing laws; and it was two days after this order had passed the ordeal of the army of law clerks in the Interior Department and the Assistant Attorney-General, and received the signature of the Secretary of the Interior, and had been promulgated—it was two days afterwards, and probably after some newspaper correspondent had intimated that the Secretary of the Interior had no power to suspend the operation of the laws—no legislative power—or after some meddlesome attorney had called attention to it, that this order was revoked.

There have been a great deal of bluster and ostentation in regard to the operations of the General Land Office under the late Commissioner.

I have taken the pains to examine to see what was accomplished by the predecessor of Mr. Sparks, and what was accomplished under him. I submit, first, a statement showing the amount of sales, of land receipts, patents issued, etc., for the year ending June 30, 1884:

From these statements it appears that for the year ending June 30, 1884, the sales of public lands amounted to 27,531,041.03 acres; for 1885, to 20,995,513.58 acres; for 1886, to 22,124,563.92 acres; and for 1887, to 25,858,038.13 acres. The receipts for the same years were as follows: 1884, $12,789,405.09; 1885, $8,629,420.18; 1886, $9,031,084.34; 1887, $12,268,224.02.

Now I come to the important part of this showing. It appears that for the year ending June 30, 1884, there were issued 51,337 patents; for the year ending June 30, 1885, the principal portion of which was under Republican administration, there were 73,172 patents issued; but for the year 1886 there were but 19,885 patents issued, and for the year 1887 there were but 24,558 patents issued.

These figures show a falling off in the number of patents issued from 73,172 issued during the year ending June 30, 1885, to 19,885 in 1886, and in the number issued for cash entries, which includes pre-emption entries as well as private entries, from 41,657 during the year ending June 30, 1885, to 7,782 for the year ending June 30, 1886. But these figures do not tell the whole story. The number of homestead patents issued during the year ending June 30, 1884, was 17,337; for the year ending June 30, 1885, 27,273; for the year ending June 30, 1886, 11,096, showing that there were issued for cash entries under the timber-culture act, the desert-land law, and for pre-emption claims altogether only about 12,000 patents during the year ending June 30, 1886, and these were undoubtedly in the main for lands entered at private entry. For the year ending June 30, 1884, there were 51,641 pre-emption filings, and for 1885 47,946. I am not able to glean from the reports what the numbers of filings were in 1886 and 1887.

So it is plain that after the present Administration came into power and up to the time the last report of the Commissioner was made, there was almost an entire suspension of the issuing of patents for pre-emption claims.

Now I come to the consideration of what I believe is claimed to be the crowning act in the administration of the public-land laws under the late Commissioner. I ask the Secretary to read the portion which I have indicated of an order revoking the withdrawal of indemnity lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

The Secretary read as follows:

I therefore direct that all lands withdrawn and now held for indemnity purposes under the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, along the main or branch lines, be restored to the public domain and opened to settlement under the general land laws, except such lands as may be covered by approved selections: Provided, The restoration shall not affect rights acquired by grantees within the primary limits of any other Congressional grant.

As to all lands covered by unapproved selections, applications to make filings and entries thereon may be received, noted, and held subject to the claim of the company, of which claim the applicant must be distinctly informed and memoranda thereof entered on his papers.

Whenever such application to file or enter is presented, alleging upon prima facie showing that the land is, from any cause, not subject to the company's right of selection, notice thereof will be given to the proper representative of the company, which will be allowed thirty days after service within which to present objections to the allowance of such filing or entry. Should the company fail to respond or show cause before the local officers why the application should not be allowed, said application for filing or entry will be admitted, and the selection held for cancellation. But should the company appear and show cause, an investigation will be ordered, under the rules of practice, to determine whether said land is subject to the claim of the company to make selection of the same, which shall be determined by the register and receiver, subject to the right of appeal in either party.

When appeals are taken from the decision of the register and receiver to your office in any of these cases, you will dispose of them without delay, and if the decision of your office shall be in favor of the company and no appeal be taken, the land shall be approved or certified for patent, without requiring futher action on the part of the company, except the usual payments required by the granting act.

If the decision of your office should be adverse to the company, and no appeal be taken, the selection will be canceled and the filing or entry allowed, subject to compliance with law.

The order of revocation herein directed shall not take effect as soon as issued, but filings and entries of the lands embraced therein shall not be received until after giving notice of the same by public advertisement for a period of thirty days—it being the intention of this order that, as against actual settlement hereafter made, the orders of the Department withdrawing said lands shall no longer be an obstacle. Rights heretofore attaching, both of the company and of settlers, will be decided according to the facts in each case.

If any lists of selections have been presented by the company with tender of fees which have been rejected and not placed on file and noted on the records of the local office, you will, if said lists are in your office or in the local office, cause said selections to be noted on the records immediately; and if such lists are not in your office or the local office, you will advise the attorney of the company that they will be allowed to file in the local office said lists of selections, and the same will be noted on the records as of the date when first presented, provided the same be presented before the lands are open to filings and entries.

Mr. DOLPH. This order is in substance that after the expiration of thirty days from notice the order of withdrawal of indemnity lands for the company shall be revoked; that in the mean time the selections made by the company shall be noted upon the plats in the general and local land offices; that if any lists of selections have been rejected they shall be received and noted, and the company is at liberty to proceed to select further indemnity lands during that period. After the expiration of thirty days the company is left (if it has not selected all the lands it was entitled to or that it desires to select) to a race of diligence with the homestead and pre-emption entrymen.

The claim that these lands were restored to the public domain is without foundation. As a matter of fact the odd sections within the indemnity limits of the railroad grants were always a part of the public domain until they were selected by the railroad companies and approved to them. They were withdrawn, it is true, from the operation of the land laws, and, as has been frequently decided by the Supreme Court, lawfully withdrawn in order that the railroad companies might secure the full amount of their grants. But when the companies had selected all the lands they were entitled to, or had had opportunity to do so, no doubt the same authority that authorized the withdrawal of the lands in the first instance was sufficient to authorize the revocation of the order; and it was the duty of the Secretary of the Interior when that time arrived to revoke them. As a matter of fact I am informed that all the railroad companies had selected, if not all the lands they were entitled to, all that were of any value; that the orders of withdrawal had served the purpose for which they were made, and that the time had arrived when they should be revoked.

What credit can be claimed by the Administration for these orders is more than I can tell. If it is claimed that they should have been made under Republican administration, what excuse can be given that two years and a half were allowed to elapse before they were made after the new Administration came into power?

I do not criticise these orders of revocation. They might have been made earlier. They were perhaps timely. But what I do criticise is the fact that under the guise of benefiting the settler he is invited to go upon the lands which have been selected by the companies as indemnity lands, and to institute a contest with the railroad company for them—a contest which must run a course of litigation in the land offices and the Department of the Interior, and afterwards in the courts, in much of which it is apparent that the settler must lose, and all to try piecemeal a question which the Secretary of the Interior had ample power to determine, and which it was his duty to have determined as between the companies and the General Government before the settler was invited to come into the controversy.

The magnitude of the litigation and of the number of contests probable, will appear from a statement of the condition of the indemnity selections. In all these land-grant acts a grant was made of a certain number of odd sections to the mile on each side of the road. There were excepted out of the grant all mineral lands except coal and iron, and also all the lands which had been sold, disposed of, or reserved by the General Government, or to which homestead and pre-emption rights had attached at the time of the location of the road. It therefore became necessary to segregate the lands of the railroad companies from the lands excepted from the grant in order to ascertain the amount of lands the companies were entitled to receive within the limits of the grant in place, and their right to select indemnity lands depended upon the amount of the loss of lands in place on account of previous sales and reservations, or the fact that the lands were mineral lands.

There were granted to nearly all these companies indemnity lands, that is, the right to select from the odd sections within certain limits outside of the grant in place lands in lieu of those which they lost in place. It was evidently the intention of Congress that as fast as these selections were made the Secretary of the Interior should approve or disapprove them, and thus segregate the lands which belonged to the railroad company from the public lands, those in place, in order that it might be known what indemnity lands the company were entitled to, and indemnity selections in order that they might be segregated from the balance of the public lands.

I do not know what the facts are in regard to other grants; but during the Forty-ninth Congress, when the bill was pending providing for the taxation of railroad lands after they were surveyed, when it was charged that the railroad companies were in default in not selecting their lands, not paying the cost of selection, the cost of surveying, and the cost of patenting, I introduced a resolution, which passed the Senate, calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for information as to the amount of land which had been surveyed within the limits of the grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad, the amount of selections of lands in place and of indemnity lands, and the amount of approvals. I send to the desk the letter of the Secretary of the Interior in response to that resolution, and I ask the Secretary to read the portion I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

3. The amount of land surveyed within the 20 and 40 mile limits of the withdrawal for said road is established at about 21,732,542 acres, distributed as follows:

	Acres.
Wisconsin	785,482
Minnesota	2,837,060
Dakota	5,561,200
Montana	3,569,650
Idaho	70,007
Washington	7,370,818
Oregon	1,538,325
Total	21,732,542

4. I transmit herewith (marked B) a tabular statement showing the number of acres in place and of indemnity lands selected by said company; the date of the approval of each list by the local land officers; the date of the receipt of each list at this office; the number of acres contained in each list; the number of acres selected each year in each of the several States and Territories in which the grant is situated, and the total number of acres selected each year.

An examination of said statement shows that said company has selected 7,903,026.25 acres within its granted limits, and 3,343,395.07 acres of indemnity lands, or 11,246,421.32 acres in all, distributed as follows:

State or Territory.	Granted limits.	Indemnity limits.	Total.
Wisconsin	2,195.30	6,436.75	8,632.05
Minnesota	1,334,189.30	694,163.30	2,028,352.60
Dakota	5,442,840.70	1,104,438.13	6,547,278.83
Montana	981,440.58	648,019.62	1,629,460.20
Idaho		9,450.13	9,450.13
Washington	142,360.37	635,500.75	777,861.12
Oregon		245,386.39	245,386.39
Total	7,903,026.25	3,343,395.07	11,246,421.32

5 and 6. Six lists, embracing 746,589.52 acres, of which 743,573.44 acres are in the State of Minnesota, and 3,016.08 acres in the Territory of Washington, have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. Following the approval of said lists the lands embraced therein were patented to the railroad company.

I transmit herewith (marked C) a statement showing the date of approval and the number of acres included in each list, and the date of and the number of acres included in each patent.

7. The cost of surveying, amounting to $42,686.50, has been paid to said company on 1,131,224.19 acres, of which 746,589.52 acres have been patented to the company, and 384,634.67 acres have not been patented.

8. The regulations of this office make the payment of the cost of selecting a condition precedent to the approval of the lists of selections by the local officers; hence the number of acres selected (11,246,421.32 acres) is the number of acres for which the cost of selecting and listing has been paid.

9. The cost of patenting is assessed at the rate of 30 cents per 100 words (15 for writing and 15 for recording), and $1 for the seal of the office, and is payable when patent is ready for delivery. The cost of patenting, amounting to $168.85, has been paid on all the patented lands, namely, 746,589.52 acres.

10. No patents are ready for delivery, as the issue of patents to said company is and has been for several years suspended on account of the failure of the company to locate and construct its road within the time required by the granting act.

11. Said company has not at any time, after being advised of the readiness of this office to issue patents, directly refused to pay the cost of survey and patent.

Mr. DOLPH. I also submit the table referred to, of the selections:

From this table it appears that these selections were made during the period from 1872 to 1886 inclusive; that there have been only 3,016.8 acres of selections approved since November 4, 1873; that for fifteen years there had been no approval of selections of lands or place or indemnity lands; that there were at the time this letter was written 11,246,421.32 acres of unapproved selections by this one company, and that 3,343,995.7 acres of these were indemnity lands. The provision in the order of revocation of the order of withdrawal of lands within the indemnity limits which allows settlers to go upon any of the lands which have been selected by the company and institute a contest makes it possible for a contest to be instituted with the railroad company for every 40-acre tract of the 3,343,000 acres of indemnity selections, and all to determine a question which it appears to me should have been determined long ago by the Secretary of the Interior, the question as to whether the lands were properly selected and the company was entitled to make the selections.

Mr. President, Congress has been (notably by the act passed during the last Congress providing for the adjustment of railroad grants) endeavoring to settle the controversies which have arisen concerning the public lands growing out of the contradictory rulings of the Interior Department, the blunders and mistakes of the local land officers, and to preserve the rights of parties who have gone upon lands supposing them to be public lands, with the consent of the land officers of the Government, which proved to be railroad lands, and also of those who have purchased lands upon the strength of the railroad title, which have afterwards proved to be public lands.

The orders for the revocation of withdrawals for indemnity purposes and other similar orders which were made under the administration of the late Commissioner will cause a multitude of suits, great confusion in land titles, and will bring down upon Congress an army of applicants for relief whose bills and petitions will crowd out the more important business of Congress, and many of whose claims will finally be paid.

A vigorous statement of this condition of things is contained in an article which I have clipped from the Portland Oregonian, which I ask to have read:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the article.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPARKS AND THE LAND OFFICE.

Commissioner Sparks, of the General Land Office, in 1885 began his administration for "reform" by sending his special agents to New Mexico to investigate land transactions and titles there. Acting on information supplied by them, Sparks in his report for that year declared the Maxwell grant notoriously fraudulent, and said that its claimants were not entitled to one-sixteenth of the lands patented to them. He therefore instituted suit to set aside the patent. The case was decided against Sparks by the United States district court for Colorado, and the decision was unanimously affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Then Sparks asked for a rehearing, but the Supreme Court declined to grant it, on the ground that no new facts were presented or alleged.

In the mean time much of this land had been "jumped" by a large number of persons who had been encouraged to do so by Sparks and his agents. The jumpers now are in a strait: but hoping perhaps that Sparks and his specials would come to their relief, they have issued hand bills threatening resistance to enforcement of the decree of the court. This has moved the President to write a letter, in the nature of a proclamation, telling them that they must obey the laws as interpreted by the Supreme Court, and warning them that resistance to the court's decree "will be visited by the penalty appropriate to the crime."

The truth is, the demagogic acts of Sparks have got the titles of a vast number of tracts of land into an entanglement that will take years to straighten out. We believe it was Solicitor-General Jenks who said it would take the courts ten years to settle the titles to lands that Sparks had unsettled. Secretary Lamar is reported to have said that he was overruling only three-fourths of Sparks's decisions, and was leaving the remaining one-fourth to be reversed by the courts.

Some two years ago Sparks decided that the Northern Pacific Railroad had no land grant between the Columbia River and Puget Sound. This decision encouraged a good many "squatters" to go upon lands in that locality claimed by the Northern Pacific Company or held under title derived from the company. Here also, however, Sparks has recently been "reversed" by the Secretary of the Interior, who decides that the Northern Pacific's grant does attach to lands between the Columbia River and Puget Sound; and the "squatters" now are in the same condition as those on the Maxwell grant.

Sparks is a cheap demagogue, and his administration of the Land Office, under pretense and cover of reform, has plunged into one absurdity and folly after another, till the country is heartily tired of him.—Oregonian.

Mr. DOLPH. It is true that the order which has been read revoking the indemnity withdrawals for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and I presume such is the case with all others, contains a provision that the settler shall be notified of the claim of the railroad company, and that upon his application the fact that he was notified shall be indorsed; and that under such a provision the settler would institute a contest at his own risk. But notwithstanding this precaution I am informed that for the lands selected by this railroad company alone there were between the date of that order in August last and the first of this year 2,100 contests instituted, and as time rolls on under all the grants, unless the questions of the right to the lands are speedily settled between the railroad companies and the Government, they will multiply into thousands.

I have allnded to a few only of the most important things signalizing the administration of the late Commissioner. Some one said, when he was at the zenith of his power and dictating the policy of the Department in regard to the public lands, that he illustrated the carrying capacity of the Administration. It remains to be seen whether he was not carried too long.

Now, I desire to say a few words in regard to the bill under consideration. As reported from the committee, if it becomes a law, it will forfeit all of the railroad land grants, which a majority of the committee believe Congress has power to forfeit, that is to say, the lands adjacent to uncompleted roads.

All these railroad grants have been repeatedly held to be grants in præsenti. Where the grant was of a given number of sections on each side of a road to be located, the grant was in the nature of a float until the line of the road was located, and then it became fixed. The title to the lands in place then became vested in the company, and nothing remained to be done in regard to them after the conditions were performed except the segregation of them from the portions of the odd sections within the limits of the grant in place which were excepted from the operation of the grant.

All these grants were probably grants upon condition-subsequent. It has been claimed, however, that in the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the grant to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and the grant to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company the condition was not an ordinary condition-subsequent, but that Congress undertook in those grants to provide what the consequences should be of a failure to perform the conditions, and provided that in case of such failure Congress might make such a disposition of the unearned lands as was necessary to secure the construction of the road; and that the lands were irrevocably pledged for that purpose.

I think that as to these roads the grant was of such a character that it may be forfeited as to the unearned lands and the lands restored to the public domain. The usual condition of these grants was that the road should be commenced within a given time, that a certain number of sections should be constructed each year, and the road completed within the time named in the act.

As has been said, it is common learning that no one but the grantor can take advantage of a failure to perform a condition subsequent, and that he can only do so by entry for a breach of the condition; that the entry by the Government can only be by legislative authority, by an act of Congress forfeiting the grant or authorizing a court to declare a forfeiture in a proceeding instituted for the purpose, or at least by authorizing some action on the part of the executive branch of the Government; and that if no entry is made for the breach of the condition subsequent until the condition is performed the condition is gone, the title becomes absolute, the right of entry on the part of the grantor can no longer be exercised, and in the case of a grant by the Government the power of forfeiture no longer exists.

It has been contended that the condition that the road should be completed within a given time was a condition which applied to the entire grant. I have heretofore, in discussing this subject, said that, in my opinion, each section of the grant, in a case where it is provided that upon the completion of a section of 10 miles, or 20 miles, or 25 miles, patents should issue to the grantee, was in legal effect a separate grant, and that when the condition was performed as to any section the right of forfeiture was gone as to that section. I have not believed that it was within the power of Congress to forfeit lands which had been earned by the construction of sections of a road, and therefore I have not been willing to vote for such a law. I have not believed, and I do not now believe, that if it were within the power of Congress to make the forfeiture it would be honest for Congress to do it.

But if I had ever had doubts upon this subject they would be now dispelled from the fact that recently one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court, and the peer of his associates in learning and ability, has upon the circuit reviewed the decisions, and in language which leaves no room for discussion or doubt has held that such was the effect of the decisions of the Supreme Court. I refer to the case of Denny vs. Dodson, decided by Mr. Justice Field in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, in which the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was construed. I submit the following extracts from his decision in that case:

The terms in which the land is granted do not support the contention of the defendant. They import the transfer of a present title and not one to arise in the future. They are "that there be, and hereby is, granted" to the company every alternate section of the lands designated. There is nothing in them to indicate that only a partial or limited interest is intended. The lands themselves, described by the sections named, are granted, and of course whatever interest the United States possessed in such lands passed, unless the import of the terms be qualified by subsequent provisions of the act, and whether such is the case we will presently consider.

Similar terms are employed in a large number of Congressional grants of land, and notably so in those made to aid in the construction of railroads. They have been considered by the Supreme Court in many instances, and in all of them have received the same interpretation, which is, that unless restricted by other clauses of the act they import a grant in præsenti, conveying at once the interest of the United States to the lands described, whatever that may be.

As the sections granted are to be along the line of the railroad, they can not be located until the line of the road is fixed. The grant is, therefore, in the nature of a float, and the title does not become definitely attached to specific sections until they are capable of identification. But when they are once identified, the title attaches as of the date of the grant, except as to such parcels as in the mean time by the terms of the act have been otherwise appropriated.

It is in this sense that the grant is termed a grant in præsenti. The cases of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wallace, 44, 65; Railroad Company vs. United States, 92 U. S., 733; Railway Company vs. Railway Company, 97 U. S., 491, and Railroad Company vs. Baldwin, 103 U. S., 426, may be examined for further illustration of this subject, and the construction by the Supreme Court of similar terms of grant. In the Leavenworth case, that court said:

"There be and is hereby granted" are words of absolute donation, and import a grant in præsenti. This court has held that they can have no other meaning, and the Land Department, on this interpretation of them, has uniformly administered every previous similar grant. They vest a present title in the State of Kansas [the grantee named], though a survey of the lands and a location of the road are necessary to give precision to it and attach it to any particular tract. The grant then becomes certain, and by relation has the same effect upon the selected parcels as if it had specifically described them." (92 U. S., 741.)

The present title here mentioned is a legal title, as distinguished from an equitable or inchoate interest arising upon a contract or promise of the Government. The words "there be and is hereby granted" are not words of contract or promise, but, as said in the citation, are words of absolute donation; that is, they transfer a present legal right to the sections designated, which becomes attached to them specifically whenever they are identified.

The defendant contends that the natural import of the granting terms is qualified and restricted by the fourth section of the act, which provides that whenever 25 miles of the road are completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, and commissioners appointed to examine the same have made a report to that effect to the President, patents shall be issued "confirming to the company the right and title to said lands situate opposite to and coterminous with the said completed section of the road."

Why, it is asked, is there a necessity of such patents if the title passed by the act itself? There are many reasons why patents should be issued upon the completion of portions of the road. They would identify the lands which are coterminous with the road completed; they would be evidence that the grantee, in the construction of that portion of the road, had fully complied with the conditions of the grant, and to that extent the grant was relieved of possibility of forfeiture for breach of its conditions, and they would obviate the necessity of any other evidence of the grantees' title to the lands embraced in them. They would thus be deeds of further assurance confirmatory of the grantees' title, and so be invaluable to them as a source of quiet and peace in their possession.

The word "confirming" is applied to such patents in section 4. Words of sale and transfer, if used, would not change the character and operation of the patents. There are many instances in the reports where such effect, that is, as deeds of further assurance or as evidence of the grantees' previous title, has been given to patents authorized or directed to be issued to parties, notwithstanding a previous legislative grant of the premises to them, or a confirmation to them of a previously existing title. The case of Langdeau vs. Hanes, reported in 21 Wallace, 521, is an instance of the latter kind. The Supreme Court there said:

"In the legislation of Congress a patent has a double operation. It is a conveyance by the Government, when the Government has any interest to convey; but where it is issued upon the confirmation of a claim of a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record, of the existence of that title, or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation. The instrument is not the less efficacious as evidence of previously existing rights because it also embodies words of release or transfer from the Government."

See also Wright vs. Roseberry, 121 United States, 488, 497; 7 Supreme Court Reports, 985.

While a legal title to the sections described, as distinguished from a merely equitable or an inchoate interest, passed to the railroad company by the act of July 2, 1864, it was not a title which could be disposed of by the company without the consent of Congress, except as each 25-mile section of the road was completed and accepted by the President, so as to cut off the right of the United States to compel the application of the lands to the purposes for which they were granted, or to prevent their forfeiture in case of the company's failure to perform the conditions of the grant. The lands were granted to aid in the construction of the road and telegraph line, and, as is evident from different provisions of the act, Congress designed to secure this application of them. But such application would not of itself operate to transfer the title; there is nothing translative of title in work performed. It would merely remove the restriction upon the use and sale of the title already granted. In that way it would not only give the grantee the right to a patent, but would render him free to sell and transfer that right to purchasers.

But, in advance of the construction of the road and telegraph line, or of particular portions, the lands could not be used without the permission of Congress, so as to cut off the rights of the United States mentioned above. Such permission was given when, on the 31st of May, 1870, by the joint resolution of the two Houses, Congress authorized the company to issue its bonds to aid in the construction and equipment of its road, and to secure the same by mortgage on its property and rights of property of all kinds and description, real, personal, and mixed, including its franchise as a corporation. In the property mentioned the lands granted to the company are included.

It can hardly be supposed that Congress would have allowed this mortgage if the company had no legal title to the lands which could be held as security for the moneys advanced on the bonds and transferred by sale upon foreclosure, in case default should be made in their payment. To suppose that Congress would sanction such a proceeding would be to impute to it complicity in a fraud, which can not be entertained for a moment. The conclusion follows that it allowed the execution of the mortgage because it had transferred to the company a title to the lands covered by its grant, which could in this way be made available to raise funds for the work.

It is not necessary to a recovery by the plaintiff that he should show that a perfect and indefeasible title to the lands granted immediately passed to the company, or anything more than a defeasible title, which would become perfect and indefeasible to coterminous lands as the road was completed. The road opposite to the premises in controversy having been completed and accepted, the title, however imperfect whilst encumbered, if it may be so termed, by the uses to which the lands were to be applied, has become perfect and indefeasible; and the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands having been paid into the Treasury of the United States, the only remaining obstacle to their sale or other disposition by the company has been removed. During the construction of the road no one could do anything to defeat the ultimate acquisition of a complete title by the company, however imperfect it may originally have been, except in one of the ways designated in the act; that is, by purchase, entry, or pre-emption before the route of the road became definitely fixed.

The contention of the defendent against this view is that, upon the failure of the company to complete the entire road within the period fixed by the act, or the supplementary act, the title to the land not then earned failed, and could be restored to the company only by affirmative action on the part of Congress; in other words, that the completion of the entire road within the time designated was a condition precedent to the vesting of title to all lands not previously earned by the construction of a road coterminous with them. For this position we find no warrant in any provision of the act. The conditions attached to the grant are the conditions subsequent, and not precedent. The object of the grant was to aid in the construction of the road. The title granted is therefore made to attach to the sections designated as soon as the location of the route of the road is definitely fixed, and a map thereof filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and is not in a state of suspense until the road, or a part of it, is constructed, although not subject to be disposed of by the company, without the consent of Congress, except as each 25-mile section is completed and accepted. The conditions as to the construction and equipment of the road and telegraph line being subsequent, and not precedent, no one but the Government, the grantor, can claim a forfeiture for breach of them. This is but common learning. As was said by the Supreme Court in Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 62:

"It is settled law that no one can take advantage of the non-performance of a condition-subsequent annexed to an estate in fee, but the grantor, or his heirs, or the successors of the grantor, if the grant proceed from an artificial person, and if they do not see fit to assert its right to enforce a forfeiture on that ground, the title remains unimpaired in the grantee. The authorities on this point, with hardly an exception, are all one way from the year books down. And the same doctrine obtains where the grant upon condition proceeds from the Government; no individual can assail the title it conveyed on the ground that the grantee has failed to perform the conditions annexed."

The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has proposed an amendment which is in conflict with this decision and with the law as I understand it.

He has also submitted for the purpose of having printed the following amendment which he proposes to offer:

SEC. 9. That the lands embraced in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Florida and Alabama to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway," approved May 17, 1856, be, and the same are hereby, excepted from the operations of this act.

I find that the grant which it is proposed to except from the operation of this bill embraces all the lands that were ever granted to the State of Florida for railroad purposes. In the act mentioned there was embraced a grant to aid in the construction of the Florida and Alabama Railroad, 165,688 acres; to aid in the construction of the Florida, Atlantic and Gulf Central Railroad, 183,153.99 acres; to aid in the construction of the Pensacola and Georgia Railroad, 1,568,729.87 acres; and to aid in the construction of the Atlantic and Gulf and West India Transit Company, 1,171,200 acres.

It appears the Senator proposes to provide in this bill for a forfeiture pro tanto of railroad grants made to other States, which have been earned as is claimed by persons who have jumped the land, and then to except from the provisions of the act the grants which have been made to his own State. I can not understand the theory upon which it is done, except it is the same upon which Artemus Ward proposed to sacrifice all his first wife's relations upon the altar of his country.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I submitted that amendment for the purpose of offering it in the event that it should appear that the bill would pass with some provisions which are now in it permitting all the fraudulent and void grants of that State to be made good in the hands of assumed purchasers for a consideration from the grantees who have no title. If the bill is to pass so as to prevent the land from being occupied by homestead settlers and actual settlers and to confirm it in the hands of speculators and grantees without right or title, then I want, if I can, to have the bill so amended as to have these grants excepted from its provisions.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill does not confirm any land to any one. As reported from the Senate committee it contains a provision which was incorporated in the bill which passed the Senate during the last Congress to forfeit the lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, to wit: That nothing in this act shall prevent the forfeiture of any other portions of the grant. It leaves the titles of homestead entrymen and others, so far as earned lands are concerned, in precisely the condition they are now in, and if it becomes a law will forfeit only unearned lands.

I can not understand why there should be any distinction made between railroad companies in regard to the forfeiture of their grants. Congress has never yet undertaken to forfeit lands which have been earned—lands adjacent to a constructed road—whether the road was constructed before or after the time limited in the act, and I hope, in the interest of fair dealing and common honesty, it never will.

The acts which have been passed for the forfeiture of land grants are, first:

An act to repeal section 1 of the act entitled "An act making a grant of lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain Railroad, from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to Helena, in Arkansas," approved July 4, 1866, and for other purposes.

That act was approved June 28, 1884. As I have said before, it was a grant which the railroad company was anxious to get rid of, so as to be absolved, without question, from their obligations under it to the Government, not having built their road upon the line designated in the grant.

The second act which was passed for the forfeiture of a land grant was "An act to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon." That was the Oregon Central land grant. It was approved January 31, 1885, and this is a description of the lands which were forfeited:

Those adjacent to and coterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road.

The next forfeiture act which was passed was "An act to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes," which was approved February 28, 1885, and it provides—

That all lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company under the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and the whole of said lands restored to the public domain and made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States, as though said grant had never been made.

In this case there was no claim that the railroad had been constructed by the company which obtained the grant. The claim set up was that a company which had taken an assignment of the grant after it had built its road was entitled to the land on account of the construction of such road. Congress did not adopt this view of the case, and undertook to forfeit the entire grant as an unearned grant.

The next act forfeiting a land grant was "An act declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads;" that is, certain Southern railroads. It provided for the forfeiture of certain grants where the roads had not been constructed, but it contained this exception:

Except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of "a railroad from Jackson to the line between the State of Mississippi and the State of Alabama," which road was completed within the time prescribed by said act; also, except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

Here is an express exception of a grant which was made in 1856 in order to give the company time to earn its lands by the construction of its road.

The next act which was passed for the forfeiture of a railroad grant was "An act to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes." The lands forfeited are thus described:

Which are adjacent to and coterminous with the uncompleted portions of the main line of said road, embraced within both the granted and indemnity limits, as contemplated to be constructed under and by the provisions of the said act of July 27, 1866.

The next act was "An act to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm"—and I call the attention of the Senator from Florida—"to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes." This act forfeited the lands—in all that part of said grant which is situate on the east side of the Mississippi River, and also in all that part of said grant on the west of the Mississippi River which is opposite to and coterminous with the part of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company which was completed on the 5th day of January, 1881.

But it is provided—

That the title of the United States and of the original grantee to the lands granted by said act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to said grantee, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, not herein declared forfeited, is relinquished, granted, conveyed, and confirmed to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, as the assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

These are all the acts forfeiting railroad land grants which have been passed up to date.

I call attention to the fact that in one of these acts there is excepted out of the provisions of it the grant to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad Company for the express purpose of allowing the company to earn those lands, and that in another that thing was done which has been the subject of so much discussion in the Senate and of which some Senators stand in such mortal fear. There were confirmed to a railroad company, not to the original grantee but to the assignee of the original grantee, the earned lands, and their title was placed by the act beyond the power of Congress to reach them.

Can it be that the location of these grants had anything to do with the action of Congress and accounted for the silence of my friend from Florida and my friend from Louisiana? If so, how can we account for the fact that the clarion voice of the then senior Senator from Nebraska, was not heard protesting against such action? There was no protest. There was silence on that side of the Chamber and silence on this side of the Chamber; and in the year 1886, without a dissenting voice, the time was extended to enable this Southern railroad company to earn its grant by the construction of its road, and even the Democratic House of Representatives consented to it, and a year later consented to the great iniquity of confirming to another Southern railroad company lands which had been earned by the construction of road after the time limited in the grant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CALL rose.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator from Florida if it is his purpose to make some remarks?

Mr. CALL. I desire to address the Senate before the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. PALMER. I was going to move that the Senate adjourn, but if the Senator desires to be heard now I will withhold my motion.

Mr. CALL. I should prefer an adjournment, because I sent away my books and papers, as I did not expect to speak this afternoon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I was going to ask——

Mr. PLUMB. I will relieve the Senator from Arkansas. I have no objection to an adjournment, or whatever disposition may be convenient to the Senate now. It is evident, of course, in the present depleted condition of the Chamber, that we can not get a vote which would be satisfactory probably to either side.

Mr. STEWART. Then I ask unanimous consent for the passage of a bill.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator can not do that until I yield the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I mean when the Senator gets through.

Mr. PLUMB. You will have time when I get through. I rose to ask unanimous consent that the bill may come up as the regular order at the conclusion of the formal morning business on the next legislative day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the pending bill, Senate bill 1430, may be resumed on Monday at the close of the formal morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, and Mr. HOAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Arkansas will yield to me simply to make one correction. The amendment which I moved yesterday to the pending bill is printed as an "amendment intended to be proposed," I see. In fact, it was an amendment actually proposed and was so stated by the Chair.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask permission to make a statement. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] informed me that he desired an executive session, and I have sent a page down to the room of the Committee on Foreign Relations to see if he is there.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 925) for the relief of Matthew W. Berryman was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 6862) for the relief of John R. Wood, John T. Ballard, and John T. Belew was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 8279) to authorize the county of Laurens, in the State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Oconee River at or near Dublin, in said county and State, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. ALDRICH. On the 20th of April the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] reported from the Committee on Military Affairs Senate bill 955, and on his motion it was indefinitely postponed. The parties interested desire to be heard further on the bill, and, with the acquiescence of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask to have the vote indefinitely postponing the bill reconsidered and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. I have a similar motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will pause until the Clerks have the number and title of the bill, so that the Journal entry can be made correctly.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the bill (S. 955) to amend the record of the Eleventh Regiment Rhode Island Volunteers in regard to the services of Capt. Amos C. Weeden.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order of indefinite postponement will be reconsidered, and the bill, with the adverse report, will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make the same motion in regard to Order of Business 997, being the bill (H. R. 2465) for the relief of the heirs of John F. Shorter. I make the motion at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed was reconsidered. The motion now is that the bill be committed.

Mr. HOAR. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD BRIDGE ACROSS BLACK RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I rise to ask unanimous consent to take up the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce this morning, to authorize the building of a railroad bridge across the Black River, in Arkansas. The road is built to the bank of that river, and some delay is occasioned by the fact that permission to build the bridge has not been granted. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 2614.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2614) to authorize the Batesville and Brinkley Railroad to build a bridge across the Black River, in Arkansas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1148 for right of way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the pending business be laid aside informally and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1148.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1148) to grant a right of way to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 10, after the words "in the" to strike out "counties" and insert "county;" in line 11, after the name "Montgomery," to insert "at or near Coffeyville;" in line 13, after the word "and," to strike out "in the vicinity of Preston, Texas," and insert "within 3 miles of where the line of the Denison and Wichita Valley Railroad crosses Red River;" after the words "commencing at," at the end of line 14, to strike out "a point thereon to be selected by said railroad company and," and insert "Ockmulgee and;" in line 16, before the word "line," to strike out "west" and insert "south;" in line 17, after the word "Territory," to insert "at or near the mouth of the North Fork of Red River;" and after the word "grounds," at the end of line 20, to strike out "hereby granted" and insert "herein provided for;" so as to make the section read:

That the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, beginning at any point to be selected by said railroad company on the south line of the State of Kansas, in the county of Labette or Montgomery, at or near Coffeyville, and running thence by the most practicable route through the Indian Territory to a point on the southern boundary of the said Indian Territory, and within 3 miles of where the line of the Denison and Wichita Valley Railroad crosses Red River, with a branch commencing at Ockmulgee and running thence westerly or southwesterly, to the south line of said Indian Territory, at or near the mouth of the North Fork of Red River, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turnouts, branches, sidings, and extensions as said company may deem it to their interest to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out all of the bill after section 1, and insert:

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the road-bed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided, further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President of the United States; one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, and one by said railroad company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of the court for the western district of Arkansas, or at the district court for the northern district of Texas, or at the district court of Kansas, upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railroad company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the findings of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court of Western Arkansas, or the district court for the northern district of Texas, or the district court of Kansas, which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition, according to the laws of the State in which the same shall be heard provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Texas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory, within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided, further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes through whose lands said line may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territory, said payments to be made in installments of $1,250 as each working section of 25 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose land said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowances provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company for said dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation or tribe would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territory is owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said Territory. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him, in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force among the different nations and tribes, according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations and tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroad as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located line through said Territory to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chief of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws, and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That the United States circuit and district courts for the northern district of Texas, the western district of Arkansas, and the district of Kansas, and such other courts as may be authorized by Congress, shall have, without reference to the amount in controversy, concurrent jurisdiction over all controversies arising between said Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company and the nations and tribes through whose territory said railway shall be constructed. Said courts shall have like jurisdiction, without reference to the amount in controversy, over all controversies arising between the inhabitants of said nations or tribes and said railway company; and the civil jurisdiction of said courts is hereby extended within the limits of said Indian Territory, without distinction as to citizenship of the parties, so far as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That said railway company shall build at least 100 miles of its railway in said Territory within two years and the remainder thereof and branches within four years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all fences, road, and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 10. That the said Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking towards the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nations any further grant of land, or its occupancy, than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 11. That all mortgages executed by said railway company conveying any portion of its railroad, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 12. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act; and the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever, prior to the construction and completion of the road, except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call attention to one provision of section 3 of the proposed amendment, which, it seems to me, is unconstitutional, or if not, it is unjust. In regard to the assessment of damages the section provides for an award of referees. That is the first step in regard to the matter of getting damages. Then either party may appeal, and if on the appeal the award be for a smaller sum than the original amount allowed, then the costs are to be assessed against the land-owner, the claimant. The land-owner is entitled to have his full compensation, of course, by the Constitution and by justice, and he is entitled to have a remedy for it. He can not help the amount of the original award, and he can not help the other party's appealing. Suppose the original referees give him a thousand dollars and the other side appeals and the amount is reduced to $900, why should all the costs of that appeal be assessed upon him? He might have been willing to take the thousand dollars without the appeal. He can not help himself. It is not just that where the person to pay the damages appeals the costs should be assessed upon the person claiming damages in any case. So I move to strike out. The clause now reads:

If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant.

That is all right; but it proceeds:

If the judgment of the court be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages.

In my own State our courts construed some very doubtful language that it could not mean that, because they said it would be in violation of the Constitution if it did. I move to strike out from line 52 to 55 of section 3 the language I have just read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 52, on page 12, after the word "appellant," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "damages" in line 55, as follows:

If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill is in the precise form that all the bills have been that have passed on this subject for the last five years. The Senator from Massachusetts will perhaps remember—but possibly it was before he came into this body—that the subject came up on application of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company for the right of way through the Indian Territory. The matter was thoroughly discussed; but the bill did not pass. It came up again on the application of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company for a right of way, and was thoroughly discussed and amended and put into shape and finally passed. Then the Indian Committee, accepting the views of the Senate on the various propositions which had been submitted, framed the projet of a general bill which has been adopted in regard to all rights of way through the Indian Territory from that time until this. I need not inform the Senator that the chairman of that committee, his colleague [Mr. DAWES] is as sensitively alive to the interests of the Indians as anybody can be. I have before me the bill passed at the last session, and which was signed by the President and became a law, an act granting the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Fort Worth and Denver City Railroad Company, containing this identical provision, as all such bills have had it; and that, whatever may be the rule in Massachusetts, is the rule in Kansas and I think in most of the Western States.

Mr. VEST. It is in Missouri.

Mr. PLUMB. As the Senator from Missouri states, it is the rule in that State; and I wish to say further that three railroad companies have built their roads under this provision and practically no controversy has arisen. It can only arise where the railroad is built through occupied lands, because it is only in those cases that an individual has the right of appeal. I think that whatever the law may actually be no harm can come from allowing this bill to go through according to the rule of the Senate and of Congress, and in fact of the Executive also, heretofore established; and in addition to that, with all due respect to the better judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], my belief is that it is not amenable to objection on constitutional grounds, and that it is in accordance with the statutes of most if not all the Western States at all events.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am not prepared to say whether the Senator from Kansas be right or not in declaring that this is in accordance with legislative precedent; but if it be, the sooner it is stopped the better, for it is clearly and demonstrably to my mind unjust. The statute first provides for a reference. There is nothing which compels the railroad company to pay anybody any damages. But the reference is established, and if the parties do not agree on their referees they are appointed by the courts. Very well; then the railroad company appears, refuses to pay any damages, and the referees award a certain sum. There is nothing which gives the party a right to accept that sum and compels the railroad to pay it. The railroad pays it or not at its election, and proceeds to appeal.

Now, we will suppose the case of a little farmer with a farm worth $300 or $400, the man having been entirely willing to settle for a reasonable sum all the time, less, perhaps, than is finally awarded him; if on the appeal the sum finally awarded to him is less than the referees awarded, he has got to pay the whole costs, it may be of summoning one hundred witnesses, and the costs may be considerably more than the whole amount awarded him. I should like to have the Senator from Kansas answer me how it is possible that can be a just or a constitutional rule. Here is a man whose land is taken without his consent; he is willing to accept a reasonable compensation all the time, or half a reasonable compensation; and yet you establish a process of law under which the other party can compel him to pay the whole costs of the proceeding, and under which in a great many cases of small claimants the costs may eat up nearly the whole or more than the whole amount awarded him.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Massachusetts repeat his amendment?

Mr. HOAR. My amendment is simply to strike out the provision that when there is any less allowed than the referees awarded the costs shall fall on the party claiming damages. The costs ought never to fall on the party claiming damages under any circumstances whatever unless he has unreasonably appealed; and I do not think they ought to be then. I say they never ought to be because he is entitled under all our constitutional provisions to a jury trial—that is the fair and reasonable way—and these referees are a mere set of men who try and see if they can not bring the parties together. That is pretty much all there is of it. They are not a constitutional tribunal. I think that where a railroad company takes my land I ought to be entitled to the costs of the proceeding which is necessary to ascertain its value until I have had my jury trial and verdict, and then if I take exceptions at that it should be at the risk of my paying costs if I do not prevail; but that an appeal to a jury should be saddled with these costs is not only unjust but unconstitutional, and it can not certainly hurt the bill to strike out that provision.

Mr. VEST. Let the amendment be adopted. I will not make a question about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNDERGROUND TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE WIRES.

Mr. HALE. I desire to make a motion to print. I move that a letter from the District commissioners be printed which was transmitted to the Senate April 16, 1888, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, being a report in relation to underground telegraph and telephone wires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

L. J. WORDEN.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 713, Senate bill 1064.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1064) for the relief of L. J. Worden. It provides for the allowance to L. J. Worden, late postmaster at Lawrence, Kans., for expenditures made for clerk-hire necessary for the proper transaction of the business of that post-office from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883, $625.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE OF ALABAMA.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senate to take up Order of Business 992, being the bill (H. R. 4082) for the relief of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to relieve the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Auburn, Ala., from all money responsibility for so much of the ordnance and ordnance stores issued to that college under its bond dated February 9, 1886, as was destroyed by fire on June 24, 1887.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WICHITA, KANS

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate bill 1924, Calendar No. 1011.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1924) for the completion of a public building at Wichita, Kans.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT RILEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 703, House bill 1438.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1438) to authorize the Kansas Valley Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Riley military reservation, in Kansas, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTY OF LATAH, IDAHO TERRITORY.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 1005, being Senate bill 2671.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2671) to create and organize the county of Latah.

Mr. STEWART. I believe the bill has been read and amended heretofore. I would say in regard to it that it is a special bill to organize a county in Idaho Territory, and it is for the reason that we have a limitation in the general law. We are trying to pass a general law to allow counties to be created by the Territorial Legislature; but all parties are agreed that it is very proper to do this, and the Committee on Territories finally concluded that they would pass this one special act, and not make it a precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments presented have been heretofore agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. SMITH.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to proceed at this time to consider the Order of Business 1080, being Senate bill 68.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 68) for the relief of James H. Smith, late postmaster at Memphis, Tenn. It provides for the payment to James H. Smith, late postmaster at Memphis, Tenn., of $407.82, in full satisfaction for money expended by him for lights necessary to, and used in, the post-office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OPIUM SMUGGLING.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in regard to opium smuggling, and which has passed and gone to the Secretary of the Treasury. I also enter a motion that the Secretary be requested to return the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest that the motion to reconsider simply be entered and lie over.

Mr. HARRIS. A motion to return must be interposed, and must be sent at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered. The clerks are not able to identify the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate full copies of the following reports and all affidavits and other evidence attached thereto or transmitted therewith, made to his Department in reference to the alleged smuggling of opium into the United States from British Columbia, to wit: A report made by Special Agent Herbert F. Beecher on or about January 6, last; a report of Special Agent George R. Tingle, made on or about April 5, instant, including the report attached thereto, if any, of William H. White, United States attorney for Washington Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire merely to enter the motion to reconsider?

Mr. HARRIS. He desires to enter the motion to reconsider and request the return of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary of the Treasury will be requested to return the resolution to the Senate, and the motion to reconsider will be entered.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BOULDER, COLO.

Mr. BOWEN. I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 937, Senate bill 956.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 4, after the word "procure," to insert "by purchase, condemnation proceedings, or otherwise;" in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty," and after the word "mentioned," at the end of line 14, to insert:

The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum above mentioned.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure, by purchase, condemnation proceedings, or otherwise, a proper site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building with fire-proof vaults, in the city of Boulder, Colo., for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in said city, at a cost of not exceeding $50,000, including cost of site, which site shall be such as will afford an open space between the building hereby authorized and any other building of not less than 40 feet; and the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose herein mentioned. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum above mentioned: Provided, That no money shall be used or applied for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the land for the site of such building shall be vested in the United States; and no expenditure of money shall be made on the building proposed to be erected on said site until the State of Colorado shall duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site or the property of the United States that may be thereon, and shall cede jurisdiction over the same during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. A. WILSON.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senate to take up House bill 1070, Order of Business 999.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1070) for the relief of J. A. Wilson. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to J. A. Wilson $42.65 on account of the robbing of the mail and the loss of registered letters for that sum, the robber being subsequently arrested, tried, and convicted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN C. FRÉMONT.

Mr. HALE. I propose to move to take up Order of Business 1066, being the bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army. I do not think the Senate can close its week's business in any more fitting way than by passing this bill. It has been intimated to me that the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] desires to submit some remarks on this question. If that is so, I do not propose to urge——

Mr. REAGAN. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the Senator will not call up that bill this evening.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator desire to debate it?

Mr. REAGAN. My throat is not well enough to enable me to speak, and I shall be glad to have the bill go over to come up at another time.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senate, whenever it reaches the bill, will pass it very quickly; but if the Senator from Texas desires to speak upon it and is not able to go on to-night, of course I shall not press it.

COUNTERPOISE BATTERY ON POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up Order of Business 709, Senate bill 2394.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2394) to authorize the construction of a counterpoise battery on the bank of the Potomac River below Washington.

It proposes to appropriate $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the construction of one counterpoise battery to mount one six-inch breech-loading rifled cannon of the new pattern. This battery is to be erected on the bank of the Potomac River below the city of Washington, and within a distance of 12 miles. Beverly Kennon, the inventor and patentee, is to superintend and direct the work, and to complete the same for actual service within three months after the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANCHORAGE OF VESSELS IN PORT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senate to take up Order of Business 994, a bill relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2605) relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York. It proposes to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury to define and establish an anchorage ground for vessels in the bay and harbor of New York and in the Hudson and East Rivers, to adopt suitable rules and regulations in relation thereto, and to take all necessary measures for the proper enforcement of such rules and regulations.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NORFOLK, VA.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 857, Senate bill 2164.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 11, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one," so as to read:

The site, and the building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 1, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $150,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE SCHNEIDER.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to call up House bill 112, Calendar No. 1087, a pension bill where, I am informed, the party is likely to die before the bill passes.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 112) granting a pension to George Schneider was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of George Schneider, late a private in Company G of the Third Regiment of United States Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting the motion the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 30, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 26, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rabbi BLUM, of Galveston, Tex.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IN THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Architect of the Capitol, in response to a resolution of the House relative to electric lighting in the Capitol; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA C. LA RUE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of Eliza C. La Rue against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT E. RUSSELL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of Robert E. Russell against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES ACROSS RED RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 7348) granting the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across Red River, returned from the Senate with an amendment and a request for conference on the disagreeing votes.

Mr. CRISP. I ask that the request of the Senate for a conference on this bill be granted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. CRISP, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. DUNHAM as the conferees on the part of the House.

MRS. JULIET G. HOWE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 8117) granting a pension to Mrs. Juliet G. Howe was by mistake sent to the Senate as having been passed, when in fact it was laid on the table. The bill has now been recalled from the Senate, and if there be no objection will be laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

JOHN C. ADAMS, ADMINISTRATOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3617) for the relief of John C. Adams, administrator of Joseph Adams, deceased; which was referred, with the amendment of the Senate, to the Committee on War Claims.

WATER SUPPLY OF CHICAGO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 3333) to authorize the city of Chicago to erect a crib in Lake Michigan for waterworks purposes, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that this bill may lie on the table for the present. My colleague who represents the district interested is not now in his seat.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will retain the bill for the present.

FRANCES ANNE PYNE RICKETTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 393) for the relief of Frances Anne Pyne Ricketts, returned with the message that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House and requested a conference.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that the request of the Senate for a conference will be granted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair will announce the conferees during the day.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred as indicated:

The bill (S. 1846) for the erection of a public building at New London, Conn.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 2003) to grant to the city of The Dalles, in the State of Oregon, certain lands for the purposes of a public park—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2311) for the relief of Heman D. Walbridge and Reginald Fendall, trustees—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 2398) to provide for a light-house at Holland's Island Bar, near the entrance to Kedge's Straits in the Chesapeake Bay, Maryland—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2457) to provide for the establishment of a light-house at or near St. Joseph's Point, Florida—to the Committee on Commerce.

OMAHA INDIANS, NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2267) for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians in Nebraska, to extend the time of payment to purchasers of lands of said Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill was read a few mornings since, and objection was then made to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska for unanimous consent to consider it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This, I understand, is recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. This bill was read on a former occasion, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] objected. The Chair understands the gentleman does not now insist upon his objection.

There being no further objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. DORSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. ADAMS.

Mr. LAFFOON. Mr. Speaker, I was absent when the Senate amendment to the House bill for the relief of John C. Adams, administrator, was laid before the House. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill, with a Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3617) for the relief of John C. Adams, administrator of Joseph Adams, deceased.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 3 of page 1 "$8,747" and insert "$4,435."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. LAFFOON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILBER, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. DAVENPORT, for one week, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 9443) to regulate the manner of adjusting the pay of employés attached to navy-yards, etc., was erroneously referred to the Committee on Claims. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] asks that the committee be discharged, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Without objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to the Committee on Military Affairs and the subcommittees to sit during the sessions of the House for the present session.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk. It is simply asking that Monday night be set aside for the consideration of business from the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House will, at 5.30 p. m. on Monday next, take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Territories, in such order as said committee may designate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OATES. I think it had better go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that objection.

Mr. OATES. I would prefer to know what bills are to be considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. We can not consider anything except by unanimous consent, for it will be impossible to keep a quorum at night.

Mr. OATES. I shall not insist upon the objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Unless there can be some arrangement made whereby other committees can have consideration at evening sessions, I think these matters had better all be left to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX, Mr. LANHAM, and others objected. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. COX. I object to the consideration of the resolution, but have no objection to its reference to the Committee on Rules. There are Committees of the House which have not had the advantages which the Committee on the Territories has had in assignments.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have not had any advantages.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has had time assigned to his committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. It has had just two hours during the entire session.

Mr. COX. That is more than some committees have had.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by several gentlemen.

PERMANENT AND INDEFINITE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to present from the Committee on Appropriations, for printing, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the bill (H. R. 1985) to repeal certain laws relating to permanent and indefinite appropriations. I ask to have this printed and recommitted to the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this embraces the appropriation for the monthly purchases of bullion for the coinage of standard silver dollars? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think it makes any reference to the subject.

INDUSTRIAL STATISTICS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back for adoption the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to report to this House a computation, based upon the returns of the census of 1880, showing—

1. What number of persons in each of the gainful occupations (professional and personal service, trade and transportation, manufactures, mechanics, mining, and agriculture) were engaged in branches of which a product of like kind could be imported from a foreign country other than Canada in any measure or quantity sufficient to call for the attention of legislators, and what additional number could be in part or wholly submitted to competition from Canada.

2. What number in each category might be considered wholly free from foreign competition.

3. What number of persons might be considered in some small measure subject to foreign competition.

4. The number of persons represented by the export of the profits of agriculture, manufactures, and mining, to be estimated upon the relation of the value or quantity of such exports to the value or quantity of the total product; in other words, the number occupied in production for export.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate.

Mr. MILLS. We do not want any debate. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. But it is the duty of the Chair to state the rule of the House governing such matters.

Mr. MILLS. Of course; but I only suggest to the Chair that no debate is demanded.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF PORTLAND, OREGON.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope the regular order will not be insisted on at this moment. I desire to make a request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may state his request, but unless the demand for the regular order is withdrawn the Chair is obliged to proceed under the rules.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. TAULBEE). State your request.

Mr. TAULBEE. On yesterday morning the Chair laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1761), with Senate amendments, and a request for a conference, with the announcement that the Senate had appointed conferees.

No one at the time asked that the House should agree to the conference. The bill, with the amendments, was referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the subject-matter?

Mr. TAULBEE. It is a bill for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States revenue-cutter Thomas Corwin.

Mr. MILLS. Let the conference be agreed to.

Mr. HERMANN. It is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Claims from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1761, to non-concur in the Senate amendments, and to agree to the conference requested by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. What are the amendments?

The SPEAKER. The bill is now with the committee. In order to have the amendments read the Chair would have to send for the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I do not insist.

There was no objection, and the conference was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the managers of the conference during the day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for reports of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the revenue.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, on the 6th day of December last the President of the United States transmitted to Congress his annual message. Unlike all preceding ones, it dealt with but a single phase of public affairs, as if thereby to emphasize the importance of that phase. The opening words of that message were:

To the Congress of the United States:

You are confronted at the threshold of your legislative duties with a condition of the national finances which imperatively demands immediate and careful consideration.

The amount of money annually exacted, through the operation of present laws, from the industries and necessities of the people, largely exceeds the sum necessary to meet the expenses of the Government.

And then, after some general observations as to the wrongs done by such a situation, he earnestly warns Congress of the necessity for immediate action. He says:

This condition of our Treasury is not altogether new; and it has more than once of late been submitted to the people's representatives in the Congress, who alone can apply a remedy. And yet the situation still continues, with aggravated incidents, more than ever presaging financial convulsion and widespread disaster.

It will not do to neglect this situation because its dangers are not now palpably imminent and apparent. They exist none the less certainly, and await the unforeseen and unexpected occasion when suddenly they will be precipitated upon us.

These words came with especial force to this House. By the Constitution all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives. The Senate can only amend or alter bills of this character after they have reached it from the House. It can not originate. Here and here alone must initial action be taken, and here and here alone is lodged the responsibility for such action. Has that action been either immediate or wise?

DELAY IN LEGISLATION.

More than four months have passed and no measure looking to any avoidance of the dangers described by the President has yet been brought to a vote. His friends are in a majority here. They control all the committees and have charge of and are responsible for legislation or the lack of it. What has been done? The Speaker was elected to that office on the 5th of December last.

He had presided over the two preceding Congresses, and was familiar with all the rules and methods of procedure. Nearly two-thirds in number of the members of this Congress had also been members of the preceding Congress, and he must have known their qualifications and capabilities; yet week after week went by and no committees were announced save on Rules and Elections. Day by day the House met, read the Journal, and adjourned. December 6, the day the message was read, it was in session just one hour and fifty minutes. December 7 it did not sit at all. December 8 it sat fifteen minutes. To throw it into tabular form, the duration of the sittings during the month of December appears, on the authority of the RECORD, as follows:

Tuesday, December 6, one hour and fifty minutes.
Wednesday, December 7, no session.
Thursday, December 8, fifteen minutes.
Friday, December 9, no session.
Saturday, December 10, no session.
Monday, December 12, one hour and twenty minutes.
Tuesday, December 13, one hour and five minutes.
Wednesday, December 14, no session.
Thursday, December 15, no session.
Friday, December 16, forty-five minutes.
Saturday, December 17, no session.
Monday, December 19, two hours and four minutes.
Tuesday, December 20, twelve minutes.
Wednesday, December 21, one hour and thirty-seven minutes.
Thursday, December 22, one hour and twelve minutes.

And on the last-named day an adjournment was had until January 4, 1888. It will be seen that for the whole of the first month of the session the House sat just ten hours and two minutes in all. The RECORD also shows that almost invariably the motions to adjourn were made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who is now chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—the committee to whose charge is referred all proposed revenue legislation.

Upon reassembling, January 4, 1888, the Speaker was not yet ready with his committees, and the day was spent in the introduction of bills, the House remaining in session four hours and forty-eight minutes for that purpose, and transacting no other business of any moment. January 5, just one month from the time of first meeting, the committees were announced, and after a session of one hour and ten minutes the House celebrated this advance toward legislation by adjourning over until the 9th. On the 9th it surprised itself and the country by sitting five hours and five minutes; but again on the 10th it sat less than two hours. After that the committees soon began to report measures for action, and after nearly one month and a half of the session had been wasted, it settled down to the consideration of business, and its sessions have been long and busy.

And yet, after all this delay, no measure was brought before us intended to relieve the situation portrayed by the President in the words I have quoted.

COMPOSITION OF COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

All matters affecting the revenue go, under the rules, to the Committee on Ways and Means, and if reported at all must be reported by that committee. In short, to it is referred, and from it must come, all proposed legislation having reference to duties on imports or affecting the internal revenue. It will be seen at a glance that it has a great power over the business interests of the country. The majority of that committee can by their votes report or withhold measures of the last importance to these interests, and it may be instructive to notice, in passing, to what extent, if any, the business and industrial interests of the country have received recognition in the selection of the members composing that majority.

They are ROGER Q. MILLS, of Corsicana, Tex.; BENTON MCMILLIN, of Carthage, Tenn.; CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE, of Pine Bluff, Ark.; W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE, of Lexington, Ky.; HENRY G. TURNER, of Quitman, Ga.; WILLIAM L. WILSON, of Charlestown, W. Va.; WILLIAM L. SCOTT, of Erie, Pa.; and WILLIAM D. BYNUM, of Indianapolis, Ind. Yes, Corsicana, and Carthage, Quitman and Pine Bluff are there, but where are Lowell and Manchester, and New York and Troy, and Newark and Birmingham, and Philadelphia and Pittsburgh? Either represented by the minority, or not at all. Take it in a larger sense, and where do we find the interests of the great States of New York, Ohio, Illinois, of the great Northwest, and of all New England, cared for? Not one member of the majority do they have.

Is this a mere coincidence? Were there no political friends of the majority in those sections? Where are COLLINS, of Massachusetts, COCKRAN, of New York, MCADOO, of New Jersey, RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, FORAN and SENEY, of Ohio, CHIPMAN, of Michigan, MANSUR, of Missouri, and WILSON, of Minnesota—all among the ablest men in this House, and all members of the majority? True these interests have representation on the minority in the persons of KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, BROWNE, of Indiana, REED, of Maine, MCKINLEY, of Ohio, and BURROWS, of Michigan; but these men, able and true as they are, are but five out of thirteen, and are outvoted on every motion. No, no; it was not a mere coincidence. The sentiments of the members of the majority upon the subject of free trade were well known prior to their selection. In a speech made in this House one of them had declared that "protection was the very debauchery of government;" and the others were all known to be opposed to protection as a policy, the chairman [Mr. MILLS] having, April 14, 1884, in a speech in the House, declared unreservedly for "free trade." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 66, page 2991.)

INTERESTS REPRESENTED BY THE COMMITTEE.

That at least six of the members of the majority should have no deep and active special interest in the welfare of those who toil at the bench, the forge, or the loom, in the mine, or in the workshop, may be inferred from a consideration of a few facts afforded us by the census reports of 1880. I have taken the counties composing the present respective districts of these gentlemen, and have tabulated the number of industrial establishments of all kinds, including saw-mills, grist-mills, distilleries, and the like, the capital invested, the number of employés, and the annual sum paid for wages, and arranged the totals by districts, as follows:

District.	Establishments.	Capital.	Output.	Employés.	Wages.
Mills	241	$552,837	$1,152,810	867	$151,530
McMillin	415	734,464	1,595,837	1,013	155,414
Breckinridge (Arkansas)	198	466,765	827,372	670	109,945
Breckinridge (Kentucky)	626	3,755,107	5,780,292	2,252	754,794
Turner	228	519,024	1,222,675	1,148	189,032
Wilson	842	3,043,295	.....	2,613	575,178
Total	.....	9,071,392	.....	8,563	1,935,893

It should be stated that more than one-half of the output in Mr. MILLS's district is from grist-mills. In Mr. MCMILLIN'S district grist and saw mills form the bulk of the establishments, there being one cotton-mill, employing 100 hands and paying $18,000 in wages. The output in the district of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, is shown by these same census reports to be nearly two-fifths whisky, while that of the district of Mr. TURNER is about one-half the products of saw and grist mills. It will be noticed that the aggregate of persons employed is 8,563, and of annual wages paid $1,935,893.

If we add to these figures the 8,001 persons employed in industrial establishments in Mr. SCOTT'S district, whose annual wages were $2,650,000, and the 11,194 persons so employed in Mr. BYNUM'S district, with their annual aggregate wages of $4,205,242, we have for the eight districts represented by these majority members an aggregate of 27,758 persons and of $8,791,135 in annual wages—an average of about 3,470 persons and $1,100,000 annual wages to a district.

COMPARISON WITH THE SECOND DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY.

Of course there has been, naturally, some increase since 1880; but allowing for this, the comparison I am about to make remains highly suggestive. Last month I addressed letters to the cashiers of the four banks in my own city—Trenton, N. J.—asking for information as to the amounts checked out each week from them for pay-roll purposes by manufacturing establishments keeping their accounts with them. The city has but about 60,000 inhabitants, and only the larger establishments check out sums especially for this purpose. I have the replies from these four banks, and I find that the sum so paid by them amounts to the yearly sum of $6,901,659, or nearly 79 per cent. of the whole amount paid out in 1880 in all of those eight districts, and more than three and one-half times the amount paid out in the whole of the six districts. One bank alone, in that one city, paid out to one industry—iron—$1,270,059; a sum about two-thirds as large as the whole sum paid out in the whole of the six districts. Take all the other industrial establishments in my district and I have good reason to believe that the annual sum for wages paid therein exceeds the total annual amount paid in the combined eight districts represented by the majority members of that committee.

This committee had before it almost from the day of its appointment bills affecting the revenue, but for months it considered none in the full committee.

A BILL FINALLY REPORTED.

Finally the chairman produced to the committee in full session a bill which, with slight amendment, was, on the 2d day of April, nearly four months after the utterance of the Presidential warning, reported to the House.

The parentage of that bill is unknown. The authors of its being have not yet felt proud enough of their offspring to claim their own. Even its birth-place is uncertain. Whether it came into existence in some dark cellar of the Capitol, attended by free-trade theorists and interested importers, or in some out-of-the-way place in the Treasury building, by clerks hired and paid by the nation to do other work, or in some back room at some hotel, while members of this House pored over Adam Smith, Frank Hurd's speeches, and Cobden Club tracts, and Kentucky inspiration flowed free, it has not yet been vouchsafed for us to know.

As to the manner of its introduction to and consideration in the committee, the minority inform us in no hesitating or uncertain terms. They say, in the terse, clear words of Mr. MCKINLEY:

The extraordinary manner in which this bill came to the committee and the total lack of consideration given to so grave a measure by those charged with its investigation demand notice and comment. It was fashioned outside of the committee and reached it not by the reference of the House, which is the usual channel through which committees obtain jurisdiction of a subject. It was presented ready-made by the chairman of the committee, was framed, completed, and printed without the knowledge of the minority and without consideration or discussion in the full committee.

If any consultations were held the minority were excluded. Thus originating, after three months of the session had gone, it was submitted to the committee. Since there has been no consideration of it. Every effort upon the part of the minority to obtain from the majority the facts and information upon which they constructed the bill proved unavailing; a resolution to refer the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of its probable effects upon the revenue, together with a statistical abstract, which would facilitate its consideration by the committee and the House, was voted down by a strict party vote.

The industries of the country, located in every section of the Union, representing vast interests closely related to the prosperity of the country, touching practically every home and fireside in the land, and which were to be affected by the bill, were denied a hearing, and the majority shut the doors of the committee against all examinations of producers, consumers, and experts, whose testimony might have enlightened the committee. The farmers, whose investments and products were to be disastrously dealt with, were denied an opportunity to address the committee.

The workingmen of the country, whose wages were at stake, were denied audience. The Representatives on the floor of the House were not permitted to voice the wants of their constituents. Proposing a grave measure which would affect all of the people in their employments, their labor, and their incomes, the majority persistently refused the people the right of hearing and discussion; denied them the simple privilege of presenting reasons and arguments against their proposed action.

These words are none too severe, and, to my personal knowledge, are literally true. Some of my constituents, deeply affected by the bill, desired a hearing. I applied for it in their behalf and a hearing was denied. Many others did likewise only to meet with a flat refusal. Then petitions began to come to us from manufacturers, farmers, operatives, and others affected by the bill, and the only means we had of securing any attention to these petitions was by having them printed, by unanimous consent, in the RECORD. As these petitions exposed the injustice and inconsistencies of the bill, some of the members of the majority, with what certainly had the semblance of a vindictive exercise of a little brief power, objected, and the last parliamentary way of bringing these petitions to the attention of the country and the House was gone, and the boasted "right of petition" became a hollow mockery.

But by whatever devious ways it came, the bill is here at last. The action has not been immediate, and we take up the second branch of our inquiry—has it been wise?

POLICY IN THE PAST.

In the consideration of this question we will refer to our policy in the past and its effect upon our growth and prosperity, then consider the present situation, and then examine the general and special features of the bill, and see whether they comport with the policy of the past and meet the exigencies of the present.

That by some means the expenses of maintaining the General Government must be raised needs no demonstration. Money must be had for that purpose. One method of raising this money is by a direct tax, whether levied upon each person, his property, or the product of his business or of his labor, and whether denominated stamp, income, excise, or internal-revenue tax. The other is by imposing duties on imports.

The opponents of customs duties are fond of calling them "tariff taxes," but if we did not have these we would be compelled to have the other. If you repeal the customs duties at once you necessitate the levying of a tax upon each person for the support of the General Government.

Our fathers early favored the laying of customs duties. Not only were the funds needed for the support of the Government readily procured thereby, but also our home industries were to that extent protected against the competition of foreign manufactures. The second act passed at the first session of the First Congress, and approved July 4, 1789, was "An act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States," and levied such duties.

Washington, in his first annual message, January 8, 1790, said:

A free people ought not only to be armed, but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite, and their safety and interest require that they should promote such manufactories as tend to render them independent on others for essential, particularly military, supplies.

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation, but I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement, as well as to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad, as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

Jefferson, in his first annual message, December 8, 1801, said:

Other circumstances, combined with the increase of numbers, have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption in a ratio far beyond that of population alone, and though the changes of foreign relations now taking place so desirably for the world may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet weighing all probabilities of expense as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all the internal taxes, comprehending excises, stamps, auctions, licenses, carriages, and refined sugars, to which the postage on newspapers may be added to facilitate the progress of information, and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of Government, to pay the interest of the public debts, and to discharge the principals in shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated.

And in his second annual message, December 15, 1802, he says:

To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises, to foster our fisheries and nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, and protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances; to preserve the faith of the nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts, expend the public money with the same care and economy we would practice with our own, and impose on our citizens no unnecessary burden; to keep in all things within the pale of our constitutional powers, and cherish the Federal Union as the only rock of safety—these, fellow-citizens, are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.

In his second inaugural, March 4, 1805, he says:

The remaining revenue on the consumption of foreign articles is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts, being collected on our seaboard and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens. It may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States?

And in a letter to Benjamin Austin, of Boston, Mass., 1816, he uses these words:

The general inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to a dependence upon that nation or to be clothed in skins and live like beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

Mr. Speaker, Thomas Jefferson, urging the abolition of the internal-revenue taxes, and the retention of the customs duties instead, and recommending the encouragement of American manufactures, would have been denied a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of this House.

Madison, in his special message, May 23, 1809, uses this language:

The revision of our public commercial laws, proper to adapt them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, will doubtless engage the early attention of Congress. It will be worthy, at the same time, of their just and provident care to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

And in his first annual message, November 29, 1809, in speaking of the condition of the country, he says:

In a cultivation of the materials, and the extension of useful manufactures, more especially in the general application to household fabrics, we behold a rapid diminution of our dependence on foreign supplies.

Madison again refers to this in his second annual message, December 5, 1810:

I feel particular satisfaction in remarking that an interior view of our country presents us with grateful proofs of its substantial and increasing prosperity. To a thriving agriculture and the improvements relating to it is added a highly interesting extension of useful manufactures, the combined product of professional occupations and of household industry.

Such, indeed, is the experience of economy, as well as of policy, in these substitutes for supplies heretofore obtained by foreign commerce, that in a national view the change is justly regarded as of itself more than a recompense for those privations and losses resulting from foreign injustice which furnished the general impulse required for its accomplishment.

How far it may be expedient to guard the infancy of this improvement in the distribution of labor by regulations of the commercial tariff, is a subject which can not fail to suggest itself to your patriotic reflections.

Passing over the utterances as decided in his third and fifth annual messages, I read from his special message of February 20, 1815, as follows:

But there is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress.

Monroe was just as decided in his utterances. In his inaugural, March 5, 1817, he says:

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing, as we do, all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries. While we are thus dependent, the sudden event of war, unsought and unexpected, can not fail to plunge us into the most serious difficulties. It is most important, too, that the capital which nourishes our manufactures should be domestic, as its influence in that case, instead of exhausting, as it may do in foreign hands, would be felt advantageously on agriculture and every other branch of industry. Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as by extending the competition it will enhance the price and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets. * * *

And in his first annual message, December 2, 1817, he reiterates these views:

Our manufactories will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge required in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation. * * *

Subsequent messages speak in the same tone, and in his seventh, December 2, 1823, he speaks as follows:

Having communicated my views to Congress, at the commencement of the last session, respecting the encouragement which ought to be given to our manufactures, and the principle on which it should be founded, I have only to add that those views remain unchanged, and that the present state of those countries with which we have the most immediate political relations and greatest commercial intercourse tends to confirm them. Under this impression I recommend a review of the tariff for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defense and independence of the country.

From the fourth annual message of John Q. Adams, December 2, 1828, I quote:

The great interests of an agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing nation are so linked in union together that no permanent cause of prosperity to one of them can operate without extending its influence to the others.

And again:

As yet no symptoms of diminution are perceptible in the receipts of the Treasury. As yet little addition of cost has even been experienced upon the article burdened with heavier duties by the last tariff. The domestic manufacturer supplies the same or a kindred article at a diminished price, and the consumer pays the same tribute to the labor of his own countryman which he must otherwise have paid to foreign industry and toil.

In the second annual message of Andrew Jackson, December 7, 1830, occur the following words:

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case; this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress. In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

Andrew Jackson seems to have been convinced of the existence in Congress of the power to levy duties and adjust them "with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry." In fact, he had before this given quite plain expression to his views. In a letter to Col. Robert Patterson, of Philadelphia, dated May 17, 1823, in acknowledging the present of a hat for Mrs. Jackson, made of American materials by American hands, he says:

Its workmanship, reflecting the highest credit upon the authors, will be regarded as an evidence of the perfection which our domestic manufactures may hereafter acquire if properly fostered and protected. Upon the success of our manufactures, as the handmaid of agriculture and commerce, depends in a great measure the independence of our country, and I assure you that none can feel more sensibly than I do the necessity of encouraging them.

In a letter to Dr. L. H. Coleman, of North Carolina, August 26, 1824, he says:

Heaven smiled upon and gave us liberty and independence. The same Providence has blessed us with the means of national independence and national defense. If we omit or refuse to use the gifts which He has extended to us we deserve not the continuance of His blessing. He has filled our mountains and our plains with minerals, with lead, iron, and copper, and given us a climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool. These being the great materials of our national defense, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in a fair competition with those of Europe, and that we may have within our country a supply of these leading and important articles so essential to war. * * *

In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and, instead of feeding paupers and laborers of England, feed our own; or else, in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall be paupers ourselves.

Sir, in these latter days a newer light seems to have arisen from the plains of Texas, and we are told that "protection is the very debauchery of government." Between these two statesmen, Andrew Jackson and ROGER Q. MILLS, I prefer to follow Jackson, and especially when Jackson is re-enforced, as he himself says, by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe.

Then came the cry that the tariff then in force bore unequally on different sections, and readjustments from time to time were made, resulting sometimes in higher, sometimes in lower rates. But through all these variations the revenue needed for governmental purposes was raised by the customs duties without the levying of internal or direct taxes, except in times of great public emergency. With the war of the rebellion came the demand for enormous sums of money and the reimposition of the internal taxes. This reimposition was distinctively a war measure, and with the close of the war and the gradual reduction of the public debt came a gradual return to the old policy, and one by one the internal taxes have been repealed, until now but two (save the small one imposed on oleomargarine) remain.

RESULTS OF THIS POLICY.

This has been the policy in the past. Of the results of that policy, as shown in the growth and prosperity of the country under its operation, I now speak. I select the period from 1860 to the present for the reason that during that interval the customs duties were much higher, and more uninterruptedly so, than at any other period, and may therefore properly be said to have been more active in their operation upon the nation's affairs than at any other time. If it be found that during that period the nation has suffered in prosperity and been retarded in her growth it would be fair to assume that this active agency is responsible.

If, on the other hand, it be found that during that period our country's growth and prosperity has been unparalleled in her history, ought not this policy of protection to have the credit? And in dealing with this period we must remember that the United States Government began the year 1861 with no money in its Treasury, with its bonds begging for purchasers at a price below par, and with a gigantic civil war upon its hands. We must remember that, aside from the vast expenditure of means and destruction of property on the Southern side of that strife, it cost the Government over $3,000,000,000 to subdue the rebellion, and entailed a large mortgage upon the resources of the country in the payment of the annual interest upon the national debt. We must remember, too, that it was during this period that for four years millions of able-bodied men were withdrawn from industrial pursuits and, clad in the habiliaments of war, became consumers and not producers of national resources and products.

Spofford's American Almanac for the year 1888, compiled by the accomplished Librarian of Congress, gives the estimated true valuation of the property, real and personal, in the United States for the year 1860 at $16,159,616,068, and for the year 1880 (the latest given) at $43,642,000,000. The amount to each person in 1860 was $514. In 1880 it was $870. During the same period the population increased from 31,443,321 to 50,155,783; thus showing, not only a large increase in numbers, but a still greater proportionate increase in average wealth. The total number of farms in 1860 was 2,044,077, with an acreage of 163,110,720 improved. In 1880 it was 4,008,907, with an acreage of 284,771,042 improved.

The value of the production for 1860 I have not at hand, and therefore can make no comparison, but the quantity produced of the three staple crops compares as follows:

	Corn.	Wheat.	Oats.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
1860	838,792,742	173,104,924	172,643,185
1880	1,754,861,535	459,479,565	407,858,990

The total aggregate value of our manufactures for 1860 was $1,885,861,676. For 1880 it was $5,369,667,706. In 1860 we had 30,635 miles of railway, in 1880 93,349 miles, and in 1887 148,987 miles, of which 11,000 miles were built the past year. I can not give the number of miles of telegraph lines for 1860 accurately, but it was somewhere near 30,000 miles. In 1887 Mr. Spofford estimates it to exceed 180,000 miles, not of wire but of line, beside railway, Government, private, and telephone lines, length not ascertainable. The length of wire will exceed three-quarters of a million of miles.

We are now producing (I state it approximately) one-fourth of the lead, one-fourth of the copper, one-third of the zinc, one-third of the silver, one-third of the gold, one-fourth of the coal, one-third of the pig-iron, two-fifths of the steel ingots, and nearly one-half of the steel rails of the world's production.

In our trade with other nations we now sell them more than we buy. From 1848 to 1860, under low tariff, the balance against us aggregated nearly $400,000,000, and had to be paid in gold and silver. Under the high tariff of 1861, as soon as we had measurably repaired the waste of the war, the tide turned, and from 1873 to 1887 the balance in our favor of commodities bought and sold has been about $1,582,088,000. The deposits in savings-banks afford a significant indication of the smaller savings of the people. In 1887 3,418,013 persons deposited $1,235,247,371 of savings, averaging $361.39 to each person.

But these statistics, though they speak of a progress as wonderful as the magic of Aladdin's lamp, can not be continued. Time presses, and I sum them all up in the opening words of Carnegie's "Triumphant Democracy:"

The old nations of the earth creep on at a snail's pace; the Republic thunders past with the rush of the express. The United States, the growth of a single century, has already reached the foremost rank among nations, and is destined soon to out-distance all others in the race.

I know that the opponents of a protective system claim that all this growth has not been the result of such a policy, but in spite of it, and that we should have done much better as a nation under another policy. But it can not be denied that we have had this policy, and with it the nation has had this growth. The era of greatest growth has been cotemporaneous with the period of greatest protection. Is it not the part of wise and enlightened statesmanship to seek to preserve the conditions under which such growth has been achieved rather than to destroy them for we know not what?

PLAN OF THE PRESIDENT—HOW RECEIVED BY OUR RIVALS.

And now, as to the present situation. The President has given us his views as to the proper course to be pursued in securing a reduction in the amount of revenue flowing into the Treasury.

Unlike Jefferson, he does not advocate the repeal of the internal revenue laws. Unlike Jackson, he manifests no deep concern that we should feed our laborers rather than those of another country; but characterizing our tariff laws as "the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation," he advises that the duties thereunder should be lowered, and in some instances abolished altogether.

The Scotchman's advice, "See what your opponent wants you to do and then don't do it," is often a good rule to follow. It is well known that England aspires to be the workshop of the world. Her limited area forbids her supporting all her population by agriculture alone. She must make goods and sell them to other nations. It is necessary to her existence as a first-class power. She is not to be censured for this; and yet it makes her our commercial and manufacturing rival, and each indication here of an increased market for her goods is watched for with eagerness and hailed with delight. How did she receive this recommendation of the President of the United States? Let her newspapers answer. I read a few of many extracts:

[From the London Saturday Review.]

President Cleveland declines cautiously to dub himself a free-trader; but he caters up a free-trade position without disguise.

[From the London Pall Mall Gazette.]

English free-traders would be well advised if they moderated the ecstacy of their jubilation over President Cleveland's message. Every word which they say in its favor will be used as a powerful argument against the adoption of its recommendations.

[From the Chronicle, London.]

It is many years since such an important and suggestive message has been sent to Congress. If the policy of President Cleveland is adopted its effect on the trade of the world can not fail to be immense.

Another paper says:

The consensus of opinion is that should Congress adopt the suggestions so unequivocally made by Mr. Cleveland the first effect would be beneficial to a large number of English industries.

The London Saturday Review again says:

Nothing can be more explicit than the President's language. "The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury." In America this means free trade.

The London Times says:

It is calculated that to give effect to Mr. Cleveland's policy duties to the amount of some £16,000,000 a year, about two-fifths of the entire customs revenue, must be surrendered. This operation may not establish free trade in the strict sense of the term, but it will to a great extent make trade free.

The London Post says:

We shall be much mistaken if the effect of this state communication will not be to strengthen considerably the case of free-traders in all parts of the world. It will be regarded as a step in the right direction by all who believe in the soundness of free-trade principles.

In two leading articles the London Colliery Guardian for December 16 says:

No event of greater magnitude has occurred in the iron, steel, and mining industries for a long time past than the proposal which is now made to effect a radical change in the fiscal policy of the United States. America has been of immense value as a market to the trade of this country. The effect which, on iron and steel making, the bare possibility even of the admittance of raw material free of duty, together with reductions in the duties of some descriptions of iron and steel, has produced upon our exchanges is a portent in itself. The Scotch warrant-holders took greater advantage of the occurrence than even the probabilities authorized. If President Cleveland should be able to carry out his plan for admission into America free of duty, one of the first effects which would be produced on the English iron trade would be the transference of much of the enormous stocks of pig in the Scotch and Cleveland markets to United States ports. Shipments of hematites from Scotland and from the west coast of England would also increase. The iron-ore mines of Lancashire and West Cumberland would be certain to do a greatly enlarged trade with the United States.

The future course of events will be watched with considerable interest by the British iron trade. It is, after all, circumstances which guide the destinies of nations, and it appears to us that the present circumstances favor the adoption by Congress of Mr. Cleveland's proposals for reducing import duties. If the duties now levied upon British rails entering American ports should be reduced to any appreciable extent, the reduction may exert a happy influence upon the British rail trade. Even as matters now stand, English rails have found some favor with American railroad companies during the last few months, and there can be little doubt that they will come into extended use in the United States if the adoption in whole or in part of Mr. Cleveland's views makes them more readily available for American consumption.

In an article on "The Coal Trade in 1887 and its Prospects for 1888," the London Times says:

If President Cleveland's tariff reforms are carried, English goods and iron and steel largely will go to the States in greatly increased proportions.

These extracts might be multiplied, but sufficient have been given to show the spirit in which our most eager competitor for our own markets receives the suggestions of the President.

THE EXISTING SURPLUS—ITS AMOUNT, AED OF WHAT COMPOSED.

There is a surplus in the Treasury and that surplus is accumulating month by month. If that surplus is of actual available cash, the President is correct in saying that such a surplus is dangerous. Money is the life-blood of business. If it congests in any one spot, derangement and danger follow. The money of the country should be in active circulation, and not lying idle in the Treasury. If cash has there accumulated beyond the probable needs of the Government, measures should be taken to put it into active circulation and to guard against future accumulation. What are the facts? So many statements have been made as to the amount of this surplus, varying so largely in amount, and so much stress has been laid upon the important part it plays in necessitating revenue legislation, that I have been at some pains to ascertain the exact facts in detail. I have here the "statement of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury of the United States" as they existed March 31, 1888, made by "James W. Hyatt, Treasurer United States."

I have reduced this statement to a plain, every-day balance-sheet, and it shows the following

Balance after all deductions		130,326,758.54

This is the exact balance as shown by the official statement, and a casual glance at this balance might lead one to suppose that this amount of actual cash was on that day, in fact, locked up in the Treasury vaults. But it will be observed that among the assets is included the sum of $61,231,647.36 deposited by the Treasury in national-bank depositories. This money is in actual circulation, and, at all events, is not lying idle in the vaults of the Government. Deduct this from the $130,326,758.54 and it leaves the sum of $69,095,111.18 in value actually in the vaults in excess of the requirements of the redemption funds and current obligations. (Here let it be noted that this statement of the Treasurer does not include in the liability column, nor does he make any mention of, the $346,600,000 outstanding legal-tenders, nor of the $7,000,000 fractional currency also outstanding, and all redeemable on demand, nor of the $1,050,000,000 of bonded indebtedness, but I have confined myself to the consideration of the statement exactly as he puts it forth, as one of current receipts and liabilities.)

THIS BALANCE IS BULLION, NOT CURRENT FUNDS.

Heretofore we have assumed that this balance of $130,326,758.54 is in actual current funds, whether locked up in the Treasury or whether loaned to the banks. But is this in fact so? Look again at the table, and you will notice that included in the assets is $121,167,828.39 of gold bullion, and $3,375,953.09 of silver bullion, aggregating $124,543,781.48. That bullion is not actual coin and never was. It never circulated from hand to hand as money. Deduct this from the Treasurer's balance, $130,326,751.54, and we have remaining $5,782,977.06. But further, we find among the assets $6,649,022.82 of "trade-dollar bullion." This is not current money, and for several years before its redemption did not circulate as money. Add this to the $124,543,781.48 of gold and silver bullion and the aggregate is $131,192,804.40—a sum $866,045.76 in excess of the Treasurer's balance. In other words, the items of "bullion" in the assets, alone, exceed the balance found. Where did the Treasurer, in the light of these facts, we may well ask, get that $61,231,647.36 he loaned the banks without trenching upon his reserve funds or substituting bullion for cash, at least in part, therein?

The balance in the Treasury—the surplus we hear so much about—is not in current funds. But we are told there is money there. Of course there is. April 1st $189,604,374.04 of gold coin was there; but against this the Government had issued and put into circulation, and is liable at any time to be called upon to redeem, gold certificates to the amount of $91,953,949. The silver dollars there amounted to $232,037,274; but against this had been issued $191,526,445 of silver certificates. These gold and silver certificates circulate as money in the stead of the coin in the vaults which they represent. The balance of coin over all these certificates is $138,161,254.24, which, as the statement shows, is required with the United States notes, deposits in the banks, minor coin, and a part of the bullion, to meet matured liabilities and maintain the required reserve funds.

To sum it all up, the gold, silver, and trade-dollar bullion, comprising a portion of the assets and aggregating $131,192,804.30, and in no sense "circulating medium," exceed by $866,045.76 the balance of $130,326,758.54 reported by the Treasurer. And of this balance so reported $61,231,647.36 has been loaned to the banks—is not in the vaults, but is in active circulation.

In the light of these facts, gathered exclusively from the official statement, what becomes of the Presidential warning of the dangers attendant upon "a withdrawal from use of the people's circulating medium?"

THE BULLION SHOULE BE COINED.

But, if there has been in fact no such withdrawal of "the people's circulating medium," the fact remains that there is in the Treasury bullion uncoined and not in use. Although it has never been a circulating medium, and its accumulation there has not disturbed the nation's supply of money, and could not, therefore, be the cause of impending commercial disaster, let us be entirely fair and admit that it is capable of being coined, and, if disbursed by the Treasury, of adding to the world's stock of money. I say unhesitatingly it ought to be so coined, and it should be put in circulation. As long as it lies in the Treasury vaults it is as useless as if still buried in California's hills and Nevada's mountains. Though not coin, it is wealth, and should be used either as coin or by its representatives, gold and silver certificates.

AMOUNT OF ANNUAL SURPLUS.

But this is not all of the situation as regards the Treasury. For some time past the revenues of the Government have exceeded its expenditures. As payment was made upon the principal of the public debt the interest charge was diminished, and with the refunding of the remainder at a lower rate of interest this charge was further reduced. In his message the President tells us, and I read his exact words:

> On the 30th day of June, 1885, the excess of revenues over public expenditures, after complying with the annual requirement of the sinking-fund act, was $17,859,735.84; during the year ended June 30, 1886, such excess amounted to $49,405,545.20; and during the year ended June 30, 1887, it reached the sum of $55,567,849.54.

So much loose talk about this excess of Treasury receipts over the needs of the Government has been indulged in that I have felt it necessary to give the figures as formulated by the President. I am content to accept them as accurate and to believe with him that as matters now stand there is such excess, and that such excess, under present conditions, is likely to continue and perhaps increase in volume.

THE REMEDY—MATTERS TO BE PREVIOUSLY CONSIDERED.

So much for the situation. Now as to the remedy. The President's plan is, as I have stated, to reduce this excess by reducing the customs duties alone. Judge KELLEY the other day reiterated his well-known belief that it should be reduced in accordance with the policy of the past, by reducing internal-revenue taxes. The bill before us proposes to reduce the excess by additions to the free-list, reduction of duties on some articles, and a partial repeal of the internal-revenue taxes on tobacco.

While these plans have their respective adherents, still others advocate taking advantage of this state of affairs to erect public works, increase the Navy, extend the postal facilities, encourage our commerce, and by a liberal and yet, as they claim, a wise expenditure put the nation alongside the progress of the age. Some of these objects certainly deserve serious consideration. With the improvement in ordnance as regards length of range and power of penetration our whole seaboard is practically defenseless, and hardly any one can be found to deny that at least a commencement toward adequate defenses should be attempted at the more important points. The condition of our Navy is well known to be deplorable. A few vessels are now in course of construction, but they will not be finished before the time when they will be needed to replace others which have been kept afloat only by the repeated expenditure from time to time of immense sums for repairs.

In my judgment we should have at least some additional swift cruisers of moderate size and ample speed, ever ready to visit any point where American interests or American honor may require. Additional vessels armored and adapted to harbor defense might be built, though it seems to be a question whether in the race between armor and ordnance it will not be eventually found that guns can be made which will fire projectiles capable of penetrating any armor that will float. Pending the solution of this problem it may be well to proceed slowly as to armored vessels, depending more upon torpedo boats and land defenses. Certainly, at any rate, it would seem to be the part of good statesmanship to carefully consider these subjects preliminary to any change in revenue legislation.

Now, as to the legislation proposed. It is intended, its friends tell us, to remedy the situation by correcting the inequalities of the present law, reducing the revenue, encouraging manufactures by giving cheaper materials, lessening the cost of goods to the customer, benefiting labor, and relieving the agricultural classes. After a careful examination of this bill, I am satisfied it will utterly fail in accomplishing any one of these objects.

THE BILL INCREASES INEQUALITIES.

Instead of correcting inequalities, I assert it increases them in number and amount. It is no careful, consistent, logical, business-like attempt to simplify, correct, and revise, made by men having a practical knowledge of the subjects dealt with, but selects articles here and there, increasing or cutting down on no discoverable logical basis.

The duty now upon pig-iron is $6.72 per long ton; steel rails now pay $17. This bill reduces the duty on pig-iron 72 cents and on rails $6. Tin plates and sheets are put upon the free-list. Tin-plates are not plates of tin, but are iron or steel plates coated with a thin covering of tin. The sheets used for this purpose are left by this bill at 30 per cent. duty. The proportion of tin to iron is not over 5 per cent. If the design were to have the tin only admitted free, it is sufficient to say that tin in ore, bar, block, or pig has been free ever since 1872. To charge an uncoated plate 30 per cent. and let it in free when coated with a free substance is certainly, to quote the words of the President already referred to, "vicious, inequitable, and illogical."

We have tin in abundance in Wyoming, Dakota, and California, the iron we have in a thousand hills, the oil needed in the manufacture we have in our cotton-seed, and yet the bill proposes to give this whole industry irrevocably to our foreign competitors. Hoop-iron, "not thinner than No. 20, wire-gauge," is put at 1.1 cents per pound, while "iron and steel cotton-ties or hoops for baling purposes, not thinner than No. 20, wire-gauge," being simply hoop-iron cut in lengths and looped at the ends, in fact advanced one stage further in manufacture, are put on the free-list.

In connection with this cotton-tie business I have learned a curious fact. Cotton has been selling in the bale by the producer at about 8 cents, and I state on authority of gentlemen engaged in the raising and selling of cotton that they sell it by gross weight, cotton, bagging, hoops, and all, so that for ties which cost 2 to 3 cents per pound they realize at least 8 cents per pound. I admit that at the other end of the line the English mills insist upon a tare, but the American mills do not. But going to the principle of the thing, why should a piece of iron around an oil barrel pay a duty when a similar piece around a cotton bale is free? It is "vicious, inequitable, and illogical."

Slabs and billets of steel at the present ad valorem rate pay about $8 per ton. This bill raises them to $11, while "round iron in coils or rods, less than seven-sixteenths of 1 inch in diameter, and bars or shapes of rolled iron, not specifically enumerated or provided for elsewhere," made from those billets, suffer a reduction of $4.48 per ton.

Steel in slabs is put at $11 per ton, as stated, while iron in slabs is put at seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound, equaling (all in long tons) $15.68 per ton. Again, while iron in slabs or blooms is rated at seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound, iron or steel beams, girders, joists, angles, etc., all in a much more advanced stage of manufacture, are put at six-tenths of 1 cent per pound, or $2.20 per ton less.

While iron and steel still pay duty, their most advanced form, sewing-needles, are placed on the free-list, and then, as if to crown all other inconsistencies in this line, sewing-machine needles are placed at 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Anchors, anvils, and heavy forgings pay 1½ cents per pound, while chains less than three-fourths of an inch in diameter, the product of hand labor, pay 1¼ cents per pound, or $5.60 per ton less. Oil-cloth foundations are put at precisely the same figure as the finished product. Verily, the words of the President, "vicious, inequitable, and illogical," are needed to describe this bill.

THE FREE LIST.

The additions to the free-list are made on no more logical bases. The so-called "raw materials," iron ore and bituminous coal, are not there. Those "necessaries of life," sugar and clothing, are not there; but hackled flax, burlaps over 60 inches in width, glue, gelatine, glycerine, potter's clays, paper-pulp, soap, wool, and other articles we produce here, and into the production of which labor largely enters, are placed on this free-list. Here, too, we find enjoying the favor of this Committee on Ways and Means chiccory, acorns, and dandelion root, "and all other articles used or intended to be used as coffee or substitutes therefor." These substances are frauds. They are used to adulterate our coffee, and are sold to us in our coffee and at coffee prices, and the committee might as well have provided for the admission free of spurious money.

Of the other additions to this list the principal are lumber, salt, and agricultural products, none raw materials, but all requiring labor to produce. Of the latter I will speak later on.

This free-list has been enlarged from time to time until now it reaches an amount not generally understood. In 1868 the goods admitted free amounted to $15,147,618. In 1887 the total was, for eleven months, $239,780,496, or about $260,000,000 for the year. For those eleven months the goods which paid duty amounted to $469,034,230, so that it appears that one-third of our imports already come in free.

WILL NOT REDUCE THE SURPLUS.

Reducing the rates on imports does not necessarily reduce the revenue. The Secretary of the Treasury has furnished tables showing the reduction this bill is expected to make, but all experience has shown that unless the reduction in rate be very great the increased importation resulting from the reduction will yield a yet larger revenue. A notable instance of this can be seen in the case of pottery ware in 1883, when, owing to an oversight in the law of 1883, there was for some three months a reduction in the rate, and the importations for that year, $8,000,000, exceeded by $2,000,000 any year before or since. The small reduction on wool by the same act was followed by an increase in duties on wool itself and four articles of its manufacture in three years of $11,465,503.

WILL NOT AID MANUFACTURES.

This bill will not aid manufacturers by giving them cheaper material. As I have shown, it positively advances the rates on some, and as to others the reduction in the rate on the product is greater than the reduction in the rate on material. The manufacturers do not want this bill. From all over the country they are sending in memorials and protests against it. The cotton spinners say:

The great reduction of rates in fine yarns will, if put in practice, rapidly increase importations, swell the revenue, and destroy existing industries at home.

The clay miners say:

We beg in the name of the capital invested in this industry, in the name of those owning clay farms, the clay miners, and the millers who prepare it for market, for the retention of the present tariff duty ($3 per ton) on this important American industry.

The salt-men say:

At present prices the entire cost to the American people for the salt they annually consume is but 8 cents per capita.

The rubber-men say:

If Mills's bill concerning these articles is adopted it will virtually destroy these industries.

The Roofers' Association say:

The majority report of Committee on Ways and Means, now before your honorable body, places tin-plate on the free-list, thus further increasing the inequalities and incongruities of the existing metal schedule, as shown above.

We therefore petition your honorable body to resist the placing of tin-plate on the free-list, and to correct the inconsistency and injustice, as described above, by raising the duties on tin-plate to be in harmony with other articles of the metal schedule.

The jute-bagging manufacturers say:

The bill reported from the committee proposes to abolish the duty on jute, and to reduce the tariff on manufactured bagging to 15 per cent. ad valorem from July 1, 1888. Based on Calcutta prices, this would make a duty of about seven-tenths of one cent per yard. The inevitable result of this provision would be to legislate out of existence every American manufacturer of bagging, to destroy five millions of capital invested in machinery on the faith of governmental policy, to throw out of employment the thousands engaged in this industry, not only depriving them of this means of livelihood, but sending their wages abroad to support labor foreign to our country, and at the same time to increase the Treasury surplus to the extent of the duties collected.

The potters say:

Previous to 1860 the United States had, practically, no white-ware potteries. The civil conflict and the incident high rate of exchange gave it an opportunity, and as a result it has grown into a great industry, producing yearly $8,000,000, distributed throughout the following States: Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, West Virginia, Indiana, Illinois, drawing materials from Maine, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, whose mines of coal, clay, flint, and feldspar have been developed and enriched thereby.

The importations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were nearly $6,000,000, dutiable value, and this has been in many instances very low. We estimate that the quantity of ware made in the United States is about equal to the amount imported, taking the year ending December 31, 1887. The number of hands employed in this industry direct will number 10,000 with nearly the same number working at the mines or in transporting the material to the potteries and thence to the markets of the country, a total of 20,000 people, two-thirds of whom have families dependent upon them, averaging five to the family, making a total of 67,000 people interested directly in the industry and affected by any legislation that tends to reduce the duties now levied, and indirectly the entire communities where potteries and mines are located.

Perhaps no business in the country requires so much capital to do a like amount of business. There is invested in this white-ware industry $8,000,000, and it annually produces about the same amount.

We can not believe that the Ways and Means Committee intend to injure this industry; but the classification and rates of duty, as proposed, would seriously cripple the business.

The proposed law makes most serious reductions here, and by a faulty reclassification will make still more serious ones in practice and allow wide scope for frauds in importations. Similar protests come from the flax and hemp spinners, the woolen-goods men, the carpet weavers, the iron mills, and every branch of industry.

DOES THE CONSUMER PAY THE DUTY!

It will not lessen the cost of goods to the consumer. The President in his message, speaking of our tariff laws, says:

These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles.

Do they? Well, let us see. Salt in barrels now pays 12 cents per 100 pounds. Salt sells at Saginaw for 60 cents per barrel of 280 pounds, including barrel at 20 cents. This would leave 40 cents for the salt. The duty on 280 pounds of salt would be within a fraction of 34 cents, leaving, if the President is correct, the salt if there were no duty at 6 cents for 280 pounds.

Cotton prints now pay 4½ cents per square yard. They can be bought of our mills here any day for a less sum. Who pays the duty there? Steel rails are selling in England for $24. The duty is $17. Added, these make $41. But the price here is $31 to $32. Who pays the $9 to $10 difference on each ton imported? It is the inevitable result of competition by home manufactories that the foreign producer consents to a smaller profit to retain, if possible, his market abroad.

As an instance of this cheapening of goods by competition under protective duties look at this advertisement clipped from a Philadelphia paper of April 8 instant:

This dinner-set, of the best American manufacture, 105 pieces, handsomely hand decorated, in several designs, only $15. The same set in plain porcelain, same number of pieces, only $10.

So many inquiries have come to us requesting an itemized account of the number of pieces constituting the above dinner-set, that we give them here: 12 plates (tea), 12 plates (breakfast), 12 plates (dinner), 12 cups (hand), 12 saucers, 1 bowl, 4 pieces (2 dishes and 2 covers), 1 sauce-boat, 3 pieces (covered butter and drainer), 12 fruit or dessert dishes, 12 butters, 2 pieces (tea-pot and cover), 2 pieces (sugar-bowl and cover), 1 cream-jug, 2 cake-plates, 2 platter dishes (Nos. 10 and 12), 1 pickle-dish, 2 vegetable-dishes (uncovered).

I can not reproduce in the RECORD the beautiful design of this set.

Here is another, cut from the same paper, in which a dinner-set of most beautiful and chaste design, and containing 142 pieces, is offered for $16.

Theories to the contrary, experience has demonstrated that as our own supply of home products increased under the operation of protection laws the prices of the home and foreign article have declined. The American producer with his genius for invention, and new and less expensive methods, learned the art of cheaper production, and the foreign competitor found, if he would retain any hold on the market here, he must himself pay the duty by deducting it in whole or in part from the selling price of his goods.

THE BILL'S TENDERNESS TOWARD TRUSTS.

We hear much of "trusts." The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] yesterday said the tariff was the parent of the trusts. Why, sir, the biggest of our trusts, aside from the sugar trust, are in petroleum, cotton-seed oil, railroads, and gas works, with which the tariff has nothing to do. But this bill does nothing to destroy trusts. It favors the copper and tin trust of Europe by letting its copper bars and tin-plate in free. The only earthenware trust in the world is one recently formed in England, and at once the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means propose to assist it by reducing the duty on its wares.

The sugar trust, one of the most powerful of them all, was touched by the bill as it originally stood, but one of its members came here and the rate was changed to a figure agreeable to him.

PROTESTS OF WORKINGMEN.

It can not benefit labor. The workmen of this country have been slow to believe it will. They resist, by appeal and protest, its passage. Wages should afford a decent living for the operative and his family, and a saving over to provide a home for their shelter and against want and suffering in sickness or old age. In many of our industries, so sharp has become the foreign competition, that wages now afford but the necessaries of life. Further reduction means deprivation and suffering. These men, who have only their labor to sell, and must sell it or starve, have a right to be heard. Though denied a hearing before the committee, it can not be denied here.

Here is a petition signed by nearly all the workingmen and workingwomen in my own city in the pottery industry, protesting against the reduction on earthenware. I have already read it to the House, but will read it again, as it is the only way they can obtain a hearing.

TRENTON, N. J., March 6, 1888.

To the honorable Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas we notice with alarm that a bill has been presented for consideration of your honorable committee, which will greatly reduce the present duty on pottery-ware, which bill, if passed, will necessitate either a ruinous reduction of our wages or lead to the closing of the potteries, therefore, we, the undersigned working people of the Trenton potteries, would respectfully urge your honorable body to so amend said bill as to remove the necessity of a reduction of our present rate of wages, and because so large a proportion of the cost of making pottery-ware is in the cost of labor.

Here is another from the woolen workers; and here are others from other industries. They all, without exception, protest against the policy embodied in this bill. Not one such petition have I received in favor of the bill. Sir, the working people of the country can not be hoodwinked. They read for themselves, and do their own thinking; and they reject with unanimity the plea of the gentleman from Texas, that this bill is for their benefit.

FARMERS INJURED.

The bill will not assist the agricultural classes. In fact, in examining it I was astonished to find that a large part of its additions to the free-list were products of the soil. Our agriculturists have not shared proportionately in the general prosperity of the country. The rapid development of the fertile West has added so enormously to the productions of the soil and the competition with India and Russia in foreign markets has grown so that corn and wheat have declined materially in price. Our farmers of the East, brought by low transportation rates into direct competition with this wheat and corn raised on lower-priced lands, have begun to turn their attention to other products.

The proposed bill puts nearly all these products on the free-list or largely reduces their rate. Thus, I find on this free-list (I take them in the order given) flax straw; flax, not hackled or dressed; flax, hackled, known as dressed lint; tow of flax or hemp; hemp, manilla, and other like substitutes for hemp; jute butts, jute; sunn, sisal-grass, and other vegetable fibers; beeswax; glue; gelatine; soap stocks; soap, hard and soft; hemp-seed and rape-seed oil; cotton-seed oil; wood tar; vegetables, in their natural state or in salt or brine, not specially enumerated or provided for; dates, plums, and prunes; currants; figs; meats, game, and poultry; milk, fresh; egg-yolks; beans, peas, and split peas; bristles, bulbs and bulbous roots; feathers of all kinds; grease; hemp and rape seed; garden seeds; flaxseed; broom-corn; tallow, and wool.

The present rates on farm products are as follows:

Wool at 30 cents a pound or less, 10 cents; at over 30 cents a pound, 12 cents. Beef and pork, 1 cent a pound. Hams and bacon, 2 cents a pound. Butter, 4 cents a pound. Lard, 2 cents a pound. Cheese, 4 cents a pound. Grapes, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Wheat, 20 cents a bushel. Oats, 10 cents a bushel. Corn, 10 cents a bushel. Rye, 15 cents a bushel. Barley, 15 cents a bushel. Potatoes, 15 cents a bushel. Hay, $2 a ton. Live animals, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Beeswax, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Vinegar, 10 cents a gallon. Honey, 20 cents a gallon. Fruit, shade, and ornamental trees, shrubs, etc., 20 per cent. ad valorem. All vegetables, not otherwise provided for, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Rice, cleaned, 2½ cents per pound. Wheat flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Tobacco (unmanufactured) 35 cents per pound. Sugar 1½ to 3½ cents per pound. Rice-flour and rice-meal, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Extract of meat, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Barley, pearled or hulled, ¼ cent per pound. Barley malt, 20 cents per bushel. Corn-meal, 10 cents per bushel. Oat-meal, ½ cent per pound. Rye-flour, ½ cent per pound. Potato and corn starch, 2 cents per pound. Pickles and sauces not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent. ad valorem. Garden seeds, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Hemp seed, ½ cent per pound. Currants, 1 cent per pound. Apples, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Hops, 8 cents per pound. Milk, preserved or condensed, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Flax-straw, $5 a ton. Flax, not dressed, $20 a ton. Flax, dressed, $40 a ton. Tow of flax or hemp, $10 a ton. Bristles, 15 cents a pound. Tallow, 1 cent a pound. Flaxseed or linseed, 20 cents per bushel.

If there be only a purpose in this bill to serve all alike it may be well to inquire why but one-fourth of a cent per pound is taken off of rice and only a half cent to three-quarters of a cent per pound on the ordinarily used grades of sugar, while meats and wool are put on the free-list.

That the farmer has need of continued or increased protection the following table of amounts of farm products imported into this country the past year will show:

Animals	$4,631,846	Rice	$1,674,334
Breadstuffs	6,640,228	Sugar and molasses	74,219,607

THE VOICE OF THE AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

From an address made February 3, 1888, by Hon. Edward W. Burrough, president of the New Jersey State board of agriculture, before that board at its fifteenth annual session, and which address was received with such satisfaction by the agricultural interests there assembled (and the delegates there assembled were in the highest sense representative farmers) that 10,000 extra copies were ordered for general distribution, I quote:

There is a duty of 20 per cent. imposed on live animals, except those for breeding purposes; of 1 cent per pound on beef and pork; of 20 per cent. on mutton; of 2 cents per pound on hams, bacon, and lard; of 4 cents per pound on butter and cheese; of 20 cents per bushel on wheat; of 10 cents per bushel on corn, rye, oats, and barley; of 15 cents per bushel on potatoes; of $2 per ton on hay; of 8 cents per pound on hops; of 7½ cents per gallon on vinegar; of 20 cents per gallon on honey; of 1 cent per pound on tallow; of from 15 cents per pound for tobacco stems up to $1 per pound for leaf, stemmed; and a duty on all wool, rice, orchard fruits, etc.

These figures sound like protection, but they are delusive. They are not high enough to keep out foreign competition, and hence are not a protection, for a protective tariff to be of direct advantage to the farmers of this country must be high enough to be practically prohibitory.

The statistics of imports of farm products for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, show that we imported agricultural products and live animals amounting to over $54,000,000, and again, during the year ending June 30, 1887, agricultural products and live animals amounting to over $54,000,000, showing an increase during the year of at least $3,000,000. Of this amount, in the year 1886, $2,552,179 was sent abroad for vegetables; 92,118 tons of hay were bought, valued at $1,035,533; 2,672,762 pounds of hops, valued at $444,989, and 16,092,583 dozens of eggs, valued at $2,173,454.

Why should it be necessary to import into this country more than $2,500,000 worth of vegetables, including cabbage from Holland; 317,156 bushels of potatoes from Scotland; 1,442,466 bushels of potatoes and 608,283 bushels of beans and peas from Nova Scotia, etc.? Why was it necessary in 1886, when every section of the country reported over an average crop, to import over $1,000,000 worth of hay and nearly $8,000,000 worth of breadstuffs, and over 16,000,000 dozen of eggs, some of which came from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden?

Giving credit for these figures to Hon. Mr. Dudley; and then, after giving these statistics in detail, he continues:

The consideration of these statistics should be sufficient to convince the most sceptical that something must be done to direct these large sums into the hands of our own producers. As the matter now stands, our importations are yearly augmented, while our home productions are but slowly increasing, and in some staples actually diminishing. A few years ago the State of Michigan was a large producer and exporter of potatoes; to-day there are hardly enough raised in that State for the immediate consumption of its people. There is scarcely a farm in the New England and Middle States the occupant of which would not gladly double his production if sufficient inducement were guarantied that he should receive remunerative prices for his products and his labor.

* * * * * * * *

The tariff on beans, peas, and other leguminous seeds should be raised from 10 per cent. to 25 per cent.; on split beans, from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent.; garden seeds, from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent.; on hay, from $2 per ton to $3; hops, from 8 cents per pound to ten cents per pound; pickles and sauces, from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent.; potatoes, from 15 cents per bushel to 25 cents; on cabbage the duty should be $1 per hundred; on onions, 25 cents per bushel; and on all other vegetables it should be not less than 25 per cent. These duties are imperative, and should be demanded by every farmer and farmers' organization in the land. We are abundantly able and willing to feed all our people, at prices but little, if anything, higher than are now paid for vast quantities of imported products.

In speaking of the importation of market-garden vegetables, he says:

I am informed that vessel-owners that fail in getting return freights from Europe and the Islands of the Gulf of St. Lawrence often load their vessels with potatoes, which they can purchase almost as cheaply as ballast, bring them into our ports, pay the duty of 15 cents per bushel on them, and place them in the hands of the wholesale dealers at about 45 cents per bushel. At these ruinously low prices we can not bring the crops of any of our Western States into the markets of the seaboard.

That I speak advisedly on this topic is confirmed by the importations received in New York January 3, 4, 5, and 6, 1888. The following are the figures showing the importations for these four days, namely:

From Liverpool, 39,189 bushels, in three shipments; from Glasgow, 36,993 bushels, in one shipment; from Dundee, 31,302 bushels, in one shipment; from Hamburg, 7,116 bushels, in one shipment; from Antwerp, 2,583 bushels, in one shipment; from Rotterdam, 2,187 bushels, in one shipment; from Copenhagen, 1,581 bushels, in one shipment; from Nova Scotia, 28,398 bushels, in one shipment; aggregating 149,349 bushels in four days.

The duties on these amounted to $22,402.35, which helps to swell that great "bugaboo" of a surplus now accumulating in the Treasury. Can this benefit the farmers of America, while it is profitable and possible for these producers to pour their products into the markets of this country, despite the present import tax, and kill off the American farmer as a competitor?

The imports of potatoes at our ports are out of all proportion to the receipts of the domestic crop.

As a further confirmation of this statement, I clip the following from the Daily State Gazette, a paper printed in this city, on January 18, 1888, namely:

"HALIFAX, N. S., January 17.—Large quantities of potatoes are still being shipped from Halifax to the United States. Five cargoes of 250,000 bushels are now ice-bound in the basin of Minas Bay, but it is expected they will get clear in a few days. Over $50,000 worth of potatoes were shipped from Halifax to the United States during the last quarter of 1887."

Since the above date these importations have largely increased.

Again, he says:

It may be argued that by increasing the duties on these products it will add to the surplus revenue. But it does not of necessity follow that the revenue will be increased by a higher tariff on these articles; the contrary is more likely to be the case. Importations will decrease to such an extent that, instead of adding to the surplus, there will be an actual diminution of the amount of duty collected. But suppose this surplus should be slightly augmented, will there be any harm done to the people? Have we not all been benefited, indirectly, by this accumulation, and is not a full treasury preferable to an empty one? Why is this $150,000,000 called a surplus, when the Government is over $1,000,000,000 in debt? Can no way be devised to use this $150,000,000 towards paying off the debt? It is hard for the farmer to understand, while he may chance to have $150 in bank, and a mortgage for $1,000 on his farm, that he has a surplus of $150.

But if it be true that the bonded indebtedness of the Government can not be reduced any more rapidly than is being done, and that the sinking fund is in such a healthy condition as not to need this so-called surplus, and that it is not needed for internal improvements, or coast defenses, that our Navy is being rebuilt rapidly enough without using this fund, there is still a use for this surplus, and a noble use, too. Let it be set aside as a national school fund, and appropriated to each of the States for the purpose of fostering the free public-school system, and thus relieve the tax-paying citizens of a portion of their heavy burdens, and bring the opportunity for free education to all sections.

And in closing he uses these manly, straightforward words:

Give us a prosperous agriculture and all other industries are bound to flourish. In it lies the stability of our Government.

I believe it right for the American people to be clothed with American goods, and to be supplied with furniture and implements of American manufacture, and I insist that the people of America shall be fed by American farmers with the products of American soil. I do not ask for exorbitant prices (and there is but little danger of such being obtained by our farmers, as the competition will be too strong), but I do ask for a steady and active home and export trade, and that foreign agriculturists be restrained from competing with American farmers in the American home market.

I have chosen thus to have the farmers of my State speak directly through their official representative rather than through words of my own, that their voice, so seldom heard in these halls, might sound in the ears of the American Congress to-day as it speaks of their needs and desires and utters their emphatic condemnation of this portion of the bill. This utterance, emphatic as it is, has since been re-enforced by official action as emphatic. March 19 ultimo I had the honor of presenting the following:

NEW JERSEY STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Trenton, N. J., March 12, 1888.

In the name of the New Jersey State board of agriculture we emphatically protest against any reduction of the duties imposed on farm produce, and we hereby memorialize our Senators and Members of Congress that in making any changes in our revenue laws they should increase rather than decrease the duties on all raw materials produced in this country.

A. BURROUGH, President.

Attest:

FRANKLIN DYE, Secretary.

INJURIOUS TO NEARLY EVERY INDUSTRY.

This bill strikes a serious blow at nearly every industry in the district I have the honor to represent. I will give some examples. Iron, pottery, woolen, and rubber goods are the chief products of Trenton. Steel rails are reduced nearly one-third; iron beams, girders, etc., over one-half; pottery, by changes in classification and rate, nearly one-half; rubber, one-half; the heavy forgings of Bordentown, one-fourth; the cast-iron pipe of Florence, Burlington, and Hainesport, two-fifths; the bagging of Manchester, one-third; the wood-pulp of Weymouth, on the free-list; and cotton manufactures of other places, one-third to one-half; and woolen, an average of at least one-half. And all market-garden truck, meats, and other farm products, to the production of which our farmers have, with the increase of the population near them, of late years devoted their capital and labor, are ruthlessly put on the free-list.

THE BILL IS WRONG IN POLICY AND IN DETAIL.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is in opposition to the teachings of Washington and the fathers of the Republic. It is in opposition to that policy in the past under which we have become a great and powerful people. It is openly advocated not only by "tariff reformers," but by avowed free-traders, as a step toward a greater departure from the policy of protection to our own interests. It is in its details "vicious, inequitable, and illogical." It will, by its many changes from specific to ad valorem rates, breed confusion in our customs service, and open a still wider door to frauds by undervaluations.

So far as it simply reduces rates it will increase the surplus by stimulating importation, and will correspondingly deprive our own labor of employment. It will, in its general effect, injure industries, lower the wages of our workmen, and will work much harm to our farmers. It will carry gain to other nations and will bring loss to our own. This is avowedly the beginning of the great battle between protection and free trade. The President, in his message, disavows advocating free trade, but our foreign rivals hailed that message with delight. We are told this measure is not free trade, but, so far as it adds to the free-list it undeniably is such, and, so far as it reduces rates it approaches free trade.

In such a contest who should hesitate on which side to array himself? Born an American; early taught to love American institutions, and to glory in America's growth, selected by the partiality of my people to participate in the direction of her affairs and to represent their interests, I would be false to my convictions and false to my trust did I not denounce this measure, and by my vote against it do what I could to preserve and promote the prosperity of my native land. [Applause.]

THE RIVAL PROCESSIONS.

Sir, the gentleman from Tennessee spoke the other day of a procession, and warned us to clear the way or be crushed, and as he spoke I saw his procession go by. At its front I saw the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means bearing aloft the flag of free trade, inscribed "European workshops for American consumers." After them came another crowd, members of Parliament, foreign manufacturers, and carriers of British goods. They scattered pamphlets as they went by, and their banners read: "The Cobden Club. We want the markets of all the world." Then filed by the unprogressives of this land, the men who cling to one idea and one interest, who see not the wealth in their hills, the power in their streams, the vast capabilities of their surroundings, who welcome not the capital and enterprise eager to bring employment to their midst to develop the wealth the Creator has so freely given and to make the desert blossom as the rose. Their banner said, "The Bourbon; he forgets nothing and learns nothing."

Then came another contingent, more powerful than all. With them, led by their chains, were the banker with his funds dependent upon the security their products offered, and the Congressmen elected by their votes and influence. They came from many sections, but mainly from one, and their banner was inscribed: "The Whisky Trust. Dividend just declared. Down with protection, and long live the internal-revenue laws."

Then, at the rear, whipping in the stragglers, encouraging the laggards, and expostulating with the wavering, came the statesman from Texas, and over all waved a foreign flag.

In the wake of this procession the light of the forge went out, the hum of industry ceased, and haggard men sought in vain for work. The products of the farm perished unbought and all the channels of trade were clogged with unsold merchandise. Distress was everywhere and bankruptcy was written over the nation's Capitol.

But, sir, I saw another procession. The shades of Washington, of Jefferson, and Jackson, and the fathers of the Republic led the van. Sturdy men, their hands hardened with toil, their faces illumined with hope, and their manhood uncrushed, came on with the united cry, "American workshops for American consumers," and with them came the wisdom of the past, the statesmanship of the present, and all the hopes of the future.

And joining their host came streaming from the coal and iron fields of Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, and West Virginia, from a thousand forges and factories in the South, from the sheep-covered plains of Texas and from the market gardens of the Southern seaboard, the enterprising and progressive sons of the new and industrial South. Steadily and firmly together they came on, resistless as Niagara and relentless as fate, and in all its beauty, with not a stripe erased and every star undimmed, over these, united in heart and purpose, and rejoicing in a common prosperity, floated the flag of a common country. [Applause.]

CORRECTION.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I see in the RECORD of this morning, page 3522, the following, stated to have occurred in the course of the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]. He said:

How has protection benefited the wool-growers? Has not the price of wool steadily fallen since 1867, when the highest rate of duty was placed upon it? The advocates of protection admit this—not only admit it, but many of them claim it as the result of "protection." Mr. Haskell, a leading member of this House from Kansas, in 1882 said:

"I have here the figures. To-day wool is cheaper per pound, and has been for the past five years, than it was from 1855 to 1860 under the free-trade rating of the free-trade party."

Then this follows:

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then how are you going to get cheaper clothing by cheaper wool?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply rise to say I asked no such idiotic question as that. But I did ask, "If that be the case, if wool was made cheaper by protection, then how are you to get cheaper clothing by free wool?" for that is the claim set up by the President and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for urging Congress to legislate wool upon the free-list. I simply desire to correct the RECORD according to the fact.

TARIFF.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The power of taxation is the most exalted and important that the people have bestowed upon their Government.

It is the right to take the property of the citizen by force of the law, and because of the manifest danger to the public welfare that inheres in so great a power and the temptation to its abuse, it should be most carefully and prudently exercised.

Every dollar taken from the citizen unnecessarily is taken from him unjustly, and the true measure of the necessities of taxation are the necessities of the Government.

Whenever, therefore, the Representatives levy and collect from the tax-payers more than is necessary for the proper support of the Government economically administered they thereby exceed the legitimate bounds of their privilege and duty, and by so much as they pass beyond these just limits they commit a great wrong which invariably bears most iniquitous results.

And as we have no right to lay taxes for excessive amounts, it must be equally clear that we have no legitimate power to collect for any other than the objects stated in the Constitution.

The right to tax the people of this country is, under the Constitution, devolved upon Congress for public purposes only, and every time we divert this power from the original purpose with which the people entrusted it to us we violate in a flagrant manner the exalted privilege with which we have been commissioned.

The revenues of this Government from which its daily recurring expenses must be met are derived principally from two sources. One is denominated the internal-revenue tax, levied upon whisky and tobacco chiefly, and which produces from one hundred to one hundred and twenty millions of dollars annually, and all of which, except a small percentage for collection, goes into the public Treasury. The other is called the tariff tax or customs dues, by means of which many millions, probably ranging from six hundred to eight hundred millions of dollars, are annually exacted from the people, and of which sum so taken about $180,000,000 to $200,000,000 reach the vaults of the Treasury.

There is no doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to collect the internal revenue, or to levy duties upon imports of foreign goods so far as this may be necessary for the carrying on of the Government.

I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the merits or demerits of the first-named system, nor shall I complain of the second so far as it is used for the legitimate purpose of revenue only.

But against the perversion of this power of taxation to the unholy and unhallowed scheme erroneously called "protection" I do complain, and shall endeavor to show its illegality and injustice, and, if I can, some of the hollow pretenses on which it is founded and has been so long maintained.

Let us inquire—

First. What is the tariff for protection?

Second. Is it legal?

Third. Is it just?

Fourth. Is it wise?

The tariff for protection may be defined as a tax or duty laid upon all the four thousand articles specified in the statute of such an amount as will prevent the domestic consumer from purchasing in the open markets of the world, and will compel him to buy of the domestic manufacturer at a price equal to the real value of the article with the tax, or a large portion of it, added on.

Or it may be said that it is a system by which the taxing power of the Government is delivered over into the hands of a few men for the purpose of enabling them to lay tribute upon the rest of their fellow citizens, and, under the transparent pretense of saving us from an alleged foreign monopoly, subjects the entire population of this country to a galling home monopoly, not only permitted but knowingly and willfully created by statute. The only difference between the home and foreign monopoly, even admitting the absurdity that there could be a foreign monopoly with all the markets of the world open to us, is that we have to pay a heavy additional percentage on the price of all protected goods for the poor privilege of having our masters on this side of the water.

The Government does not require this revenue for itself, and does not expect or intend to receive it, but as it has been very aptly put, says to these favored classes, "I do not need to tax the consumer for myself, but I will hold him for you while you tax him."

The theory upon which this system is founded, as has been stated, is, that if portions of the earnings of every citizen in this broad land are taken from him by process of law and turned over to the manufacturer who spends them on himself, it will somehow or other work a great benefit to the country, which, by some means or other, will be lost if the citizen is permitted to retain his own money and spend it on himself.

It may possibly be some consolation to the tax-ridden people of the country to know that in statutory language the tariff is denominated a "duty." How this noblest word in the English language should have been so misappropriated and misapplied, it is difficult to conceive unless it was first spoken in indignant derision by some honest man in the effort to give expression to his outraged feelings; for whatever else may be said of the tariff it can hardly be honestly claimed that there is any "duty" resting upon the good people of this country to support in affluence and idleness a class of their fellow-citizens whose chief claim to distinction is the equanimity, ability, and constancy with which they devour the fruits of other men's toil.

Second. Is it legal?

It is a fundamental principle of the Constitution of the United States and of the several States of the Union that private property shall not be taken for public purposes without just compensation. This is universally admitted to be elementary justice.

Under the scheme of tariff taxation, however, private property is daily and hourly taken, not for public but for private uses, without any compensation and without any excuse or pretext, except such as excites the derision and contempt of every disinterested, unprejudiced man.

This plan as it is now and has been for years administered in this country is a monstrous perversion of every just principle of taxation. Under it the necessities of the Government cease to be the limit of the sum gathered from the people, and the amount that is required to be levied on imported goods so as to prevent the citizen from buying where he can get most for his money and that will compel him to buy in American markets becomes the limit of taxation. Last year this "limit" was $47 on every $100 that the people spent for the four thousand dutiable articles, while the true tax limit, governed by the just needs of the Government, would have been probably less than one-fourth of that sum.

That the power of taxation can only be lawfully used in aid of a public object—that is, an object which is within the purposes for which governments are established—has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Loan Association vs. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655. In this case the question was whether an act of the Legislature was constitutional which authorized certain towns to issue bonds or loan their credit to encourage manufactures and then tax the public to redeem its obligations. It was held that the Legislature could grant no such power, and the court says:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizens, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation; it is a decree under legislative forms. * * * We have established—> we think, beyond cavil, that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose.

This is the decision of the highest tribunal in the land, and it is so clear and forcible in its statement of the right principle of taxation that nothing can be added to it.

IS IT JUST?

It is well to remember in this connection that every dollar that is taken from the citizen by tariff or other form of taxation is simply a requisition by the Government for so much of his time and labor as is necessary to earn the sum required of him. And those whose necessities require the expenditure of the largest portions of their annual incomes pay by far the heaviest percentage of this tax in proportion to their ability.

The working classes, who spend their entire income in the support of themselves and families, are the most oppressed of all our citizens by the present system of taxation. The man who earns enough to live on and to spare saves any taxation by the tariff on so much of his income as he lays away and does not spend, and if he invests it in the class of enterprises that are protected by the law he not only saves that sum from taxation, but he thereby converts the tariff to his own benefit.

And if the laborer who last year spent all his income desires this year to buy from the man who has laid aside and invested his money, or from any of the same class, he must not only pay the full market price for his goods, but in addition so much as the law says is necessary to protect the richer of the two men against the right of the poorer to buy in a cheaper market. Every dollar that the former invests in the protected industries becomes abnormally increased, while every one the latter earns by labor becomes abnormally decreased in its power of purchasing. So that under this law, which should bear equally on all men, the rich become richer and the poor poorer, and what is the protection of one man is the ruination of another.

Under this system the citizen does not pay on what he owns, but only on what he buys; so that if a man possessed of a million dollars' worth of property chooses to spend only $1,000 a year on his living he would pay under these tariff laws the same amount of tax paid by another having no property, but who was compelled to spend $1,000 a year for the support of himself and family. And yet the immense possessions of the former would be protected by the laws, and he would be made secure in all his rights to this property, which, however much it may be taxed under State laws, contributes nothing whatever to the revenues of the General Government.

IS IT WISE?

Let us answer this question by considering the general results of the law and then its effects on particular classes of citizens. It is claimed by the advocates of protection that it diversifies industries and increases the general prosperity of the country, and it is not too much to say that no improvement in the condition of the people has ever taken place that these men were not prepared to claim credit for it. They might, with as much justice, take credit for the dews of heaven or for the early and latter rain. Nothing seems to me to be clearer than that values can not be created by statute. If so, the labor which we daily perform, and which was placed upon the human race as a curse, is absolutely useless. Statutes can and do, however, greatly affect the distribution of values. This latter is the one aim and sole outcome of protective laws.

If we could get these two ideas once imbedded in the minds of the American people, first, that the law can not make values; second, that it can and does alter their distribution, a tremendous stride would be made toward the final and correct solution of the question we are now discussing.

The leading theory of the protective system is, that by adding to the selling price of certain specified articles people are induced to invest their capital in enterprises for the production of these articles in which otherwise they would not, because it would not pay, and that in this way new industries are multiplied and the country enriched. That is, they claim that by taxation they make that profitable which would otherwise be a losing business. But is the general welfare improved by this transfer of one man's money to another? One thing is certain, and that is that if the law gives one man a dollar it must first take it from another or make it from nothing, and this latter piece of folly even the protectionists have not yet contended for. But as to how soon they will depends largely, if we are to judge by their past history, upon how closely they are pressed for arguments.

Another thing is certain, that to do anything against nature costs more than to follow her wise and beneficent laws. And this diversion of capital and labor from their ordinary and natural channels furnishes no exception to this general rule.

From these two axiomatic propositions it is manifest that not only is there no improvement from protection, but there is an actual loss; for just to the extent that the investors in these enterprises would lose money in them in the natural course of business just to that extent does the tariff cause a waste of capital.

From the natural level up to the non-losing level the tariff must first lift the industry, and it lifts it by means of the money taken from other occupations, and hence there is that much waste of capital in overcoming the natural disadvantages that attach to the maintenance of such an enterprise in this country.

If the people of any town or city have $1,000,000 to invest in any one year, and they put $900,000 in unprotected industries which will pay 10 per cent. they make a profit of $90,000. And if, instead of investing the other $100,000 in a similar enterprise, they are induced by protection to risk it in some business which without the tariff would be a losing one of 10 per cent., then this loss of 10 per cent. on the $100,000 so invested must be made good by taxing the other industries to that extent. This, however, only saves the parties interested in this enterprise from actual loss, and if it is deemed proper that a fair profit should be made, then a second tax of $10,000 must be levied on the paying industries for that purpose. So that the outcome is that the chance of making a legitimate profit of $10,000 on the hundred thousand dollars is thrown away; the first $10,000 raised by taxation is wasted in order to make good a loss occasioned by putting the money in the protected industry, and the second $10,000 paid out as profits is simply transferred from those who earned it to those who did not. In such a case the tax would be collected by adding by law to the price of the goods manufactured by the protected industry.

Or, to put it in another way, a citizen who is induced by the protection which the tariff affords to enter upon a business which without the protection would be a losing one, say, of 20 per cent. on his capital, must by means of the tariff first overcome that natural disadvantage of 20 per cent. before he can save himself from loss or be prepared to reap any profit, and hence the capital consumed in overcoming that 20 per cent. of natural loss is simply wasted and must be made good by taxation upon other industries, while but for this law this money so taken as well as that in the protected industry would be employed in some other business at a profit.

The gain to the country from protected industries is not to be measured by the profits they make, for against these must be offset the interest or dividend that would have arisen from this money when employed in some channel in which it would naturally flow, as also the loss and waste that arises from diverting things from their usual and proper course.

And as it is with the country at large so is it with each individual. If two men starting in the world be equally equipped for the race of life and are under just and equal laws they must keep well together until the end. But if the law has a favorite between them on account of the occupation he follows, or for any other reason, and takes the burden from his shoulders and places it upon those of his less fortunate competitor, it soon becomes an unequal contest, for the burden of the two men is borne on the shoulders of one.

The general good is not increased, for just by so much as one is helped the other is hindered, and the only outcome of the application of such a doctrine is to accelerate the progress of one at the equal if not the greater cost of the other.

As has been suggested by a writer on this subject, it may seem a little paradoxical to say so, but the greatest misfortune that can befall the tax-payers of this country is the establishment of a new industry by means of protection. For every time some crank of a citizen takes it into his head to make his living by some business that either does not pay at all or not as much as he thinks it ought to the people of the country must be taxed to make good the deficiency. And every time a new metal or other marketable substance is dsicovered in the bowels of the earth immediately a tax is levied upon the public for the benefit of the owner of this new wealth, and from that day it costs more labor and money to procure what we need of this substance than it did before the misfortune of this discovery befell the country.

So that under this law what ought to be a national blessing becomes a national calamity.

Instead, therefore, of protection being, as is claimed, the source of all our improvement, I think we may say that the progress this country has made is represented by the propelling force of our natural resources and advantages worked and controlled by human energy and skill, less the hinderance put upon us by taxation, and of course the heavier the tax is the greater the loss it has caused us.

It may not be improper here to say that if it is the determination of the advocates of protection that the people shall still continue to be taxed to pay a premium to some men for making their own living, they certainly ought to see that it goes to their pets in the form of profits; for if the sum taken is to be wasted in overcoming the natural disadvantages of the business these men in their folly may select the tribute we pay confers no benefit on any one, and is absolutely consumed to no good purpose.

It is very hard for us to pay this money, and especially when we have not even the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the objects of our enforced charity, these people to whose support we are compelled to contribute daily; but it adds an additional pang to know that much of this tribute is completely wasted in the foolish effort to establish and maintain enterprises in defiance of common sense, and in the very teeth of all the natural laws of trade and commerce.

This plan of taxation is denominated a system of "protection," and we are naturally led to inquire, who does it protect, and against whom, or what?

We protect our country against a foe that threatens to invade it; we protect our homes against the thief or burglar, our persons against the assassin, and our character against the slanderer. These are all wrongs and wrong-doers. Against whom do these favorites of the Government ask protection?

The only protection that this Government has any right to exercise is to protect itself against any enemy that threatens it and each of its citizens, within its proper sphere, from any injustice at the hands of any other person.

It is a total perversion of this power intrusted to the Government by the people when it is used for any other purpose, and especially when it is made the means of helping one set of our countrymen at the expense of another.

In order, however, to give this a popular character, and to excite for it a public sympathy, it is claimed by the friends of this system that it is necessary to maintain it in order to "protect" our laborers against the alleged "pauper labor" of Europe.

But is this what they really mean?

Except in a humanitarian sense it can be a matter of no concern to the people of America as to how numerous the pauper laborers of Europe may be, nor how cheaply they work, nor what their condition is. As to these things we are and must be, in a financial and political sense, indifferent. It is only when the products of the labor of these workmen reach American workers and we are about to exchange the products of our labor for theirs that any real interest is awakened in these people, for it is then that the manufacturer begins to call upon the Government to protect him; it is then that he demands that he shall be surrounded by the law and safely guarded. But against what? Not against the "pauper labor," for they are not here, and not against the products of their toil so long as these are not sold here; but the protection asked for is against allowing Americans to buy or exchange, i. e., against the natural right of any free man to make his purchases where his taste inclines him or his judgment or interest dictates. So that it is not against the pauper labor of Europe or of any other country, but it is against the right of the American people to buy where and what they please that this protection is demanded. That is, they ask protection, not against any wrong, but against a right of their own countrymen, and demand that one citizen's privileges shall be increased by having those of another curtailed.

It is clear, therefore, that it is not against the "pauper labor of Europe," except in a very indirect and remote way, that our protection laws are aimed, for so long as he keeps his handiwork at home or sells it on the other side of the Atlantic he excites no interest whatever on this side of the water.

It is only when an American citizen, following his inclination or interest, starts to exchange the fruits of his honest and laborious toil, whether it be cotton, corn, wheat, or tobacco, that the Government lays its hand upon him and says, "No; for it has been solemnly decreed that certain of the citizens of this country shall be guarded and protected against the natural right of the others to dispose of the products of their own labor according to their own judgment."

This one thing illustrates the sham character of this whole business. For under the miserable canting cry of protection against the pauper labor of Europe, sung into the ear of the voters of this country, the great body of the American people have been willfully and notoriously robbed of one of their dearest rights; and from the laborers of this country has been wrung enough money to make every one of them independently rich.

These four words, "pauper labor of Europe," have cost the tax-payers of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Why should not the same principle apply to the protective tariff on rice?

Mr. HEMPHILL. My friend from Rhode Island seems to think that everything in South Carolina revolves around rice.

Mr. SPOONER. It appears to, in this bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now, so far as I am concerned, I will vote to put rice on the free-list if my friend [Mr. SPOONER] will vote to put wool on the free-list. That is a fair offer. I will state further that I have refused to vote for an amendment to keep bagging at the tariff rate it now bears, although it is quite a large interest in South Carolina, because I believe it to be the duty of every Representative to do his best to see that this bill gets through by some means or other.

Mr. SPOONER. I think I am a little broader in my views than my friend from South Carolina, because I will vote to protect wool, although it is not a considerable product in my own section of the country, because I believe that it ought to be protected for the national welfare.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly, because you belong to that great phalanx of manufacturers, or their representatives, who have gotten the taxing power of this country into their hands, and you will not vote for any tariff reduction lest your ranks should be broken.

Mr. SPOONER. We do not object to any proper reduction that does not impair the protective principle.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, your idea of a proper reduction has never been put into shape. The Republicans have been talking about that "proper reduction" for the last twenty years, but they have never done anything.

Mr. SPOONER. The last reduction that was made in the tariff was made by a Republican Congress and approved by a Republican President.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Was that the one made by the Tariff Commission that was appointed to reduce it and actually increased it?

Mr. SPOONER. No; by Congress, the law-making power.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You mean the 10 per cent. horizontal reduction, which was laid again as soon as Congress could meet thereafter?

Mr. SPOONER. It was not horizontal.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you approve of those features of the bill which put wool on the free-list and yet protect rice?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I approve of this bill from beginning to end. Of course there can not be any bill to which some objection can not be made, and I do not say that this one is perfect; but we all know very well that if we are ever to get any reduction of taxation we must make some sacrifices.

Mr. DAVIS. The trouble is that you do not appear to make any sacrifices.

Mr. HEMPHILL. On the contrary, I have just stated that there is a large industry in my State, the bagging manufacture, which it is stated will be greatly injured, if not utterly ruined, by this bill, and yet I have refused to vote to change the bill in that particular.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I would say to him, do not let our side get you down to particulars. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. You are thinking of your own side. They never like to get down to particulars; but I am on a different side.

Mr. KERR. We like to get down to the particulars of rice any way.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes. Well, I think our friend from Iowa is going crazy on rice. There are some other industries in this country besides rice.

Mr. PERKINS. Our friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] seems to be good natured about submitting to interrogatories.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Then, I will ask the gentleman a question. Do you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Then you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Who said so?

Mr. PERKINS. Does it not necessarily follow?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I think so.

Mr. PERKINS. If we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest, why should we not be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly. I think that is right.

Mr. BLAND. It is just the other way. You will not let the people buy where they can buy cheapest; but you hire where you can hire cheapest. You bring in the pauper labor of Europe to compete in our labor market.

Mr PERKINS. That is what you are contending for, and it is against that that we are fighting here.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] will come over here and listen to my speech I think I can make my position on that subject very clear to him.

Mr. PERKINS. It will give me pleasure to listen to the gentleman.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It should be remembered, further, that of the laborers of this country about whom these vociferous protectionists talk so much, and for whom they do so little, only about one in seven or eight is engaged in the protected industries. The other seven-eighths of the whole are not only left to fight their battles unaided, and that, too, without their full resources, but are compelled to contribute of their substance to the support of their more fortunate fellows.

But if the law is really intended to protect the one-eighth of our labor, those who are employed in the favored industries, it is very curious that some direct and practical step has not been taken to effect the alleged purpose.

If these gentlemen mean what they say, why have they not passed a law to prohibit the importation of foreign labor into this country? Instead of this being the policy of these protectionists, their policy is to throw wide open the gates of entry for the laborers from all countries, save now the Celestial Empire, and it has been for years proclaimed by windy patriots from every stump and platform that America is the home of the poor and oppressed of every land and country.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is that confined to protectionists?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that we have voted to restrict the introduction of contract laborers, convicts, etc.?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know whether the gentleman voted for it or not——

Mr. MILLIKEN. I did.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But that is the law. That is one of the conditions to which we are brought. If a man wants to come here and go to work and make an honest living, and if he makes an agreement to work for a living when he comes here, he can not get in; but if he comes here as a "tramp," to float around over the country without any purpose of making a living, he is welcomed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How can the gentleman say that in the face of the law which has been passed to keep "tramps" out. I will go as far as the gentleman will toward keeping them out, and I have no doubt every protectionist in the country will do the same.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Is it not the fact that the man who undertakes to come here under a contract to go to work and make a living can not get in; but the man who comes here without having made any such contract, and without any purpose to go to work and make a living, can get in.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not know that it is the fact——

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is the law.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And I think the gentleman from South Carolina does not know it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is the law.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina is in favor of prohibiting the immigration of contract labor?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; I believe in freedom all around.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then my friend is in favor of permitting the "tramps" to come in.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If I am I do not see that I am any worse than you are; and if I can be as good as a man from Maine, I am sure I ought to be satisfied. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not want to bandy compliments; but I know no better man than the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I am obliged to my friend, and will say the same of him.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Now, that settles it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. When these so-called "pauper laborers" reach our shores, through our open ports, upon our invitation, do the manufacturers protect the American laborer by refusing to employ his foreign competitor, and by this means aid in keeping up the wages in this country? On the contrary, they not only employ the foreigner if he will work cheaper, but the instances are not a few in which these very protectionists who are so painfully solicitous about the rights of workingmen actually send agents abroad to make contracts with these same "pauper laborers" of Europe at the lowest possible figure and bring them here for the purpose of breaking down the very men they are pretending to protect.

So long as they are voting themselves profits out of other people's money these protected classes deal with a lavish hand, but when it comes to paying for the labor in their establishments they are as careful as if they were really not reaping where others have sown.

The laboring man is the seller of labor and the purchaser of commodities, and if the tariff was really intended for his benefit it is clear that the natural and logical thing to do would be to protect, not what he is compelled to buy, but what he has the privilege of selling.

As the law now stands, however, it leaves the only thing that the laborer has to sell unguarded in a free and open market, but from an alleged tender consideration for the same man it is very careful to see that what he has to purchase shall cost him from 5 per cent. to 100, 200, and 300 per cent. more than the articles are really worth.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow a question right here?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Does the Mills bill protect the laborer against foreign competition?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Why did you not in that bill put a duty on imported labor?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I was not on the committee, and, besides, I do not believe in a "duty" of that kind; that is a misnomer, I think.

So that this law, nominally framed for the workingman's benefit, when properly understood, is seen, not only to furnish him no relief, but lays an additional burden upon him. For it is clear beyond controversy that every dollar added to the value of the commodities for which labor is exchanged is equivalent to a dollar taken from the value of labor.

These self-constituted champions of the laboring man lead him all the way round through the abstruse theory of protection to commodities, the multiplication and diversification of industries, higher prices to the manufacturer, general prosperity of the country, etc., feeding him all the time on glittering promises, and then bring him out in the end with nothing in his pocket.

By this law the protectionist says to the laborers of this country, This law is for you and it is intended that you shall receive the benefit of it in increased wages; but for some reason (which the protectionist has never yet had time to explain) we deem it best to pay the money arising under it to another set of men whose interests in this particular are directly hostile to yours, and who, as matter of fact, have never been known to give you one cent they could withhold from you.

So the law really does go to the extent of levying the tax, collecting the money, and paying it over to the manufacturer, but beyond that it does not go. Then, turning to the expectant laborer, with that exquisite and poetic sense of justice that really saturates the whole scheme, it says: "I can go no further; this money which has been pretensively gathered for you has been paid over to others, and now you may help yourself if you can."

Mr. LANHAM. Has the gentleman found any recorded instance where an employer went out to find a high-priced employé?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; I have looked for such a case in vain.

The difficulties and trials that some of the laboring people of this country have had in getting a portion of the money that, according to the theory of protection, was theirs by right is well illustrated by the following official figures as to the "strikes" and "lockouts" that have occurred in this country from 1881 to 1886, both inclusive:

Strikes.

Years.	Number.		Average establishments to a strike.	Employés striking and involved.
	Strikes.	Establishments.
1881	471	2,928	6.2	129,521
1882	454	2,105	4.6	154,609
1883	478	2,759	5.8	149,763
1884	443	2,367	5.3	147,043
1885	645	2,284	3.5	242,705
1886	1,412	9,893	7.0	500,514
Total	3,903	22,336	5.7	1,324,152

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman think that lowering the wages of the operatives would tend to prevent strikes?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Not at all; but I think that lowering the prices of articles which they are compelled to buy would do them just about as much good as any service we could render them.

Mr. JACKSON. Even if they had nothing with which to buy the articles?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now, there is where we differ. A person's view on this question depends altogether on whether he approaches it from the side of the man who pays the taxes or from the side of the man who gets them. That is just thedifference between my friend and myself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. You pay all the taxes down in your country, do you?

Mr. HEMPHILL. We pay all that are levied upon us; we pay our full share, I assure you.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will my friend from South Carolina allow me one question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Would taking the duty off rice make it cheaper?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know; but I think it would.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Then why does not the Mills bill take the duty off rice, so that the laboring man can obtain it more cheaply? Why does it not, for the same reason, take the duty off sugar as well?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have already stated twice that I am not a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and therefore am not in their secrets.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. But you are going to vote for their bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I hope the time will come when South Carolina will have something else to talk about besides rice. If we could only get something else.

Mr. DAVIS. We hope that the industries of South Carolina will be diversified in time by the principle of protection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will come directly to the subject of diversification of industries.

Lockouts.

Years.	Number.		Average establishments to a lockout.	Employés locked out.
	Lockouts.	Establishments.
1881	6	9	1.5	655
1882	21	42	2.0	4,131
1883	28	117	4.2	20,512
1884	38	354	9.3	18,121
1885	52	183	3.5	15,424
1886	127	1,477	11.6	100,705
Total	272	2,182	8.0	159,548

So that in these six years nearly one million five hundred thousand laborers in this country have, at different seasons, been spending their time, labor, and means in the vain effort to secure what the protectionists have taught them to believe was theirs, and which in theory is theirs, but which in fact they have never seen, nor was it intended that they should.

Surely the bald absurdity and injustice of this thing must some day strike the intelligent laborer of this country and awaken him to some appreciation of the hollowness of this sham on which he has been so long fed.

Honesty and truth require that if this money is collected for the manufacturers to whom it is paid, then we should say so; if it is collected for the wage-workers, as is alleged, then it should be paid to them. To collect nominally for one and actually pay another is neither honest nor truthful. If, however, the friends of this system are genuinely sincere in its advocacy, then we can only say that—

Protectionists move in a mysterious way,
Their wonders to perform.

In discussing this point I have not thought it necessary to go at any length into figures to show the amount of wages paid in other lands than ours.

Nothing can be more unfair and misleading than to state simply the wages paid by the day to the employés in a certain business in different countries, and from that undertake to argue that those receiving the most money were really obtaining the highest compensation and were the best cared for.

To arrive at a fair and just conclusion upon this question many elements must be considered in the calculation. The number of hours constituting a day's labor, the swiftness and perfection of the machinery used, the output of a day's work, price to be paid for the rent of houses, and for food and clothing in their respective homes must all be factors in settling the question as to which laborers are the best paid.

Without wearying you with figures, I may say that some of the highest authorities hold that American operatives do not receive any moneyed increase in wages over their English competitors. Upon this point it will be of interest to quote from the report of the representatives of forty thousand textile workers of Philadelphia made during last year. They say:

The popular notion is that the wages of labor plays an important part in these peculiar transactions, and that the difference between American and European wages is the main thing that prevents our manufacturers from competing in the home market with the foreign manufacturers, and in this connection it is fashionable to overstate American wages by citing isolated and exceptional cases instead of the average. We have in our possession a wage-list (official) of a mill near Huddersfield, England, which compared with that of one of the largest mills in Philadelphia shows the same average, but the extras paid in the English mill make its rates a little higher than the Philadelphia mill. We have also a list of another Philadelphia mill, which shows an average of $3.76 to $8.30 per week for steady work.

In the last United States Consular Reports the general average wages of weavers outside the mills in England is given at $6.31 per week; in seven selected mills in New Jersey the average is $6.72 per week; but it must be borne in mind that the American weaver turns out at least one-third more work than the English weaver in the woolen industry and nearly one-half more in the cotton industry, and this is another evidence that our tariff laws have failed to keep American wages up to the measure of the productiveness of the workmen, and therefore fail to protect them, because the tax on raw materials neutralizes the wage account and deprives American labor of the chance to compete with foreign labor even in our own market.

This testimony comes from those who ought to understand this business, for they follow it every day and who are bound to know what they received because that is their only means of livelihood. And if these figures are true, then it is clear that the compensation received by Americans is no greater than that paid in other countries under like circumstances.

But if the tariff controls wages why does it not maintain them and keep them steady during the great panics and depressions in business that unhappily come upon this country so often? And why is it that wages are higher in free-trade England than in protected France, and still higher than in still more protected Germany?

Is it not a fact undeniable that when business is brisk wages are high, and when dull wages are low, although the tariff remains unchanged? When the laborer is receiving good pay for his work he does not need the tariff, and when he has to come down to poor pay the tariff does him no good.

The truth is that wages are not governed by the tariff, but by the general surroundings and opportunities afforded by the country—such as the productiveness of the soil, the extent of territory as compared with population, the number of laborers, the wants of the people, and their ability to purchase. In other words, wages are determined by the supply of and the demand for labor, and under the same great general law that governs the price of all other things. There is high authority for the statement that in those countries where the working classes have no political power it is not even pretended that the tariff increases wages. That pretense is left for the countries in which votes can be caught by it.

The real difference between the laborers of Europe and America is the same in character as that which exists between like classes of people in our large, thickly-populated cities in the East and the newer cities in the West. It is simply the advantage that comes to the latter from more opportunities in a wider field, with less competition and less of a struggle for human existence.

Again, if the theory of the protectionist is correct, and if the payment of increased prices to the owners of great corporate franchises and properties really increases the wages of their employés, then this Government and that of the various States of this Union have been guilty of a great wrong to the laborers of the country in trying to lessen and control by legislation the rates for freight and travel on our great railroads, and instead of diminishing the charges of these mighty institutions we ought to encourage them in every legitimate mode in extravagance and extortion; for I take it to be clear that if paying increased prices to the manufacturer increases the wages of his employés, so will the payment of like prices to a railroad increase the earnings of its laborers.

Hence under this theory it is manifest that the proper way to settle the great strikes on these roads is not to send a committee from Congress to smooth them over, but to pay the owners of these mighty corporations large sums of money from the public Treasury, or authorize them to levy and collect three or four times their present rates from the people who are compelled to patronize them. For, according to the friends of protection, there is nothing in the heavens above, the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth that so satisfies the cravings of the soul and body of a half-fed and half-clothed laboring man as to see his employer luxuriating in the money that has been unjustly wrung from a long-suffering and patient people under the miserable pretense that it was for the benefit of the laborer.

To the great manufacturers of steel rails we are now paying $17 per ton more than they are worth, and this under the claim that it is for the use and benefit of the men they employ. Why not likewise and for the same purpose give to the mighty corporations that control the railroads and that buy these steel rails, a like increase of pay for their services? If the employés of one of these corporations is benefited by this process, why would not those of the other be likewise? Why pay the increased price to those who roll the rails and refuse it those who roll over the rails?

Mr. DUNHAM. Does the gentleman think that if the tariff were taken off steel rails we would get them $17 a ton cheaper than now

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How long?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Just as long as it is profitable for the people of England or any other country to make them.

Mr. DUNHAM. Do you suppose anybody else in this country agrees with you on this point?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I do not suppose you do, because you, or the people you represent, are reaping the benefits of this duty. I never can appreciate the danger of our being flooded with cheap goods. There is one thing certain, we are not going to get more than we can pay for. You may rely on that.

During the session of the last Congress there was a most extensive strike among the employés of the Southwestern Railway, and the members of this body became so much interested in and concerned about it that they sent a special committee to examine into the whole matter and report to the House.

Again during the session of this Congress there was a similar strike of the employés of the Reading Railroad, and when the resolutions for an investigation came to be considered, the burning desire of some of our worthy protectionist friends to speak some harsh words against the railroad corporation and to champion the laboring man's rights was wonderful to behold. The like of it we have not seen this session. Now, if protection is right, this proceeding was not only useless and foolish, but it was wrong.

What they ought to do to be consistent is to levy more taxes and pay the Reading road more money. For the panacea of the protectionists for all our ills is by means of a politico-economic fiction (with the emphasis on the politico) to increase the wages of the laborer by paying more money to opulent and arrogant corporations, with which he is compelled to carry on a perpetual and unequal contest for the pittance that keeps him from the poor-house. Can there be found in this Congress or out of it a single individual who would dare to advocate the payment of higher rates to Mr. Jay Gould, to the Vanderbilts, or other owners of great railroads, under the plea of increasing the compensation of their employés? I risk little in saying that such a thing, so absurd, has never been dreamed of, and yet that is what we are doing every day and hour to the manufacturers under the system of protection under which we are now groaning.

Another claim for the maintenance of protection is that if a reduction of the tariff be effected we will strike down the manufacturers and artisans who constitute the best customers of the farmers. This of course is a mere assumption, which the history of the country proves to be absolutely without foundation.

But if it be true and the farmers have to be taxed at the rate of 47 per cent. on all their purchases, for the purpose of keeping up a set of customers to buy their products at their real market value, the sooner we can get rid of these barnacles, holding themselves out to the public in the guise of the "farmers' customers," the better it will be for the country and for the farmers particularly.

The farmers of my country are not asking for any such customers; in fact, they are exceedingly anxious to be freed from them, fully realizing that this luxury is too expensive, and that a man who digs his dollars out of the ground can not afford to pay such an extravagant price for persons to buy the products of his labor.

The manufacturers seem to forget that the farmers are as good and regular customers of theirs as they are of the farmers. This, it seems, would about equalize things if they each sold their goods at their true market price. But why the farmer should be compelled to sell the product of his labor at its real value and the manufacturer be privileged to sell his at 47 per cent. above its value has not been, in my judgment can not be, satisfactorily explained to any fair-minded man.

According to the figures of the last census there were 17,392,099 persons in the United States engaged in useful industries. Of these 7,670,493 were employed in agricultural pursuits and 2,623,089 in such industries as are generally admitted to be benefited by protection. This makes three farmers to every protected manufacturer; and can anything be more ridiculous than to suppose that three men should find it necessary or wise to tax themselves over 40 per cent. of the value of nearly all their purchases in order to keep up one man to buy some of the products of their labor?

This taxing of the farmers to provide themselves with a few customers, euphoniously called the home market theory by the protectionists, seems still more transparent when we remember what a very large percentage of all crops and especially of provisions are consumed on the farm and never go to market, and the further fact that in the last census year we sold and shipped to foreign markets over 40 per cent. of the wheat, over 20 per cent. of the rye, over 45 per cent. of the leaf-tobacco, over 16 per cent. of the sugar, 29 per cent. of the molasses, and nearly 77 per cent. of the cotton made in the United States, showing that the prices of these, the chief products of our agricultural lands, are fixed by foreign competition, and that we must look to other markets than our own for the sale of a very large part of our crops.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Why is it that wool, which is a farm product, is to be put upon the free-list, and yet the tariff is kept up on the manufactured articles of wool?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think so far as that is concerned the object of this proceeding is to benefit the most people we can under this bill; and the people who are engaged in wool-growing are very few in comparison with those who will be benefited by taking the duty off of wool.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Why, then, does the gentleman not take the duty off of manufactured woolen products at the same time that he proposes to take the duty off of wool?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Will you vote for that?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will say this: that by taking off the tax on wool and putting it on the free-list, I believe the country will be eventually benefited, yet at the same time we know you can not pass a bill now taking the tax off of everything without ruining a great deal of business which has been built up under the protective system. [Applause.] Therefore it is the duty of Congressmen here to do practical work and bring in a measure with some chance of success.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. But is it just to the farmer to say that wool, which is one of the products of his industry, shall be put upon the free-list while the manufactures of wool shall be taxed?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is a benefit to him in this way: There is not one farmer out of fifty who has an interest in growing wool, while all the other farmers have an interest in buying cheap woolen goods.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from South Carolina has been interrupted, and I hope his time will be extended.

Mr. LAFFOON. I move that the gentleman's time be extended for twenty minutes, which I believe is all he requires to extend his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the extension of the gentleman's time?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman has been repeatedly interrupted, and I suggest that his time be extended until his remarks are concluded.

Mr. LAFFOON. Twenty minutes are enough.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to an unlimited extension?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes.

Mr. DUNHAM. I understood the gentleman to say, in reply to a question of my colleague, that the reason he proposes to put wool on the free-list and leave the tariff on the manufactured article is because the greatest number will be benefited thereby.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then why not make sugar free.

Mr. HEMPHILL. For this simple reason. Because the money paid in the way of duty on sugar goes, every dollar of it, into the Treasury as revenue, to the extent of some $50,000,000.

Mr. DUNHAM. One hundred thousand are only interested in the raising of sugar, while sixty million people are interested as consumers in getting it at the cheapest rate possible.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is a difference only between the men who want to tax the people of the country for the benefit of manufactures as well as the Government and the men who think it is our duty to tax no more than is necessary for the support of the Government. That is the only difference.

Mr. BELDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a simple question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELDEN. Do I understand you to say in regard to steel rails that if the duty is taken off you think steel rails will then be sold for that much less?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I believe that the price will go down nearly to the amount of the tariff which is taken off.

Mr. BELDEN. Do you believe if the duty be taken off that steel rails can then be purchased in this country for $14 a ton?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think they can be purchased at that—near that price.

Mr. BELDEN. That is enough. I am converted.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman is easily converted.

Mr. BELDEN. I am satisfied when the gentleman states here upon this floor that after the duty on steel rails has been removed steel rails can be purchased for $14 a ton.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question, if he will permit me.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules gentlemen must address the Chair, and in that way everybody will be protected in his rights.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. BRUMM. The question I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina is this: Why do you favor in this bill a tariff on iron that is used for binding barrels—hoop-iron—whereas the iron that is to be used in baling cotton is permitted to come in free, and the same kind of iron?

Mr. HEMPHILL. According to your theory, then, I presume, if you can not help everybody you would not help anybody.

Mr. BRUMM. No, that is not my theory. I have asked the gentleman a question; is that his answer?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is my answer.

Mr. BRUMM. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. HEMPHILL. "Do the best you can under the circumstances" is a maxim which is necessary in practical legislation.

An examination of the figures to be found in the census taken in the last three decades, beginning with 1850, tells a tale as to the effect of a high tariff on agriculture as nothing else can, and sets at rest forever all the beautiful theories of protectionists about furnishing a home market for the farmers. I quote:

By the census of 1850 the estimated value of farms in the United States was $3,271,575,426. In 1860 the value was estimated at $6,645,045,007, showing an increase value during the decade of $3,373,469,581, or more than 100 per cent. In 1870 the value of the farms was estimated at $9,262,803,891, showing an increase during the decade of $2,617,758,861, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the value of farms was estimated at $10,197,696,776, being an increase during the decade of $939,292,915, or only a fraction over 9 per cent. (See Compendium of the Census of 1880, page 658.)

The value of the live-stock in the United States in 1850 was estimated at $544,180,566. In 1860 it was valued at $1,089,329,915. The increase during the decade was $545,149,349, or over 100 per cent. In 1870 it was estimated at $1,525,276,547, being an increase during the decade of $435,946,542, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the live-stock was valued at $1,500,464,609, being a decrease during the decade of nearly $25,000,000, or more than 1½ per cent.

There seems every reason to believe that between 1850 and 1860 there was a very rapid increase in wealth. In the general prosperity of the country the great farming community appears to have fully participated. Then, as now, it comprised about half of all our people. Starting in 1850 with less than $4,000,000,000 they increased their wealth by more than an equal amount in ten years. But since 1860, with far more than twice as much capital, and added millions of persons employed, they have scarcely been able, even by the highest estimates the census officers could possibly make, to add as much to their wealth in twenty years as they did in the preceding ten. In 1860 farmers owned half of the wealth of the country. In 1880 they owned but a quarter. By the census estimates the other half of the community between 1860 and 1880 increased their wealth by more than $23,000,000,000. But farmers starting with an equal capital increased their wealth during the same time only a little more than $4,000,000,000.

Does not the gentleman consider it extraordinary that the country should have done so well as that after all the waste of a disastrous war and at a time when money was dropping in value?

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? I suppose that estimate to which he is now referring includes also the States of the South?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, in 1870 the destruction of the resources of the South ought to be taken into account.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think that ought to be taken into account.

Mr. DAVIS. And then from 1870 to 1880 the gentleman should also take into consideration the drop of an inflated currency down to a hard-money basis.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not think it is entirely fair to claim all of the benefits for protection and to put all of the defects upon something else.

Mr. DAVIS. That is very true; but are not these facts to which I have called the gentleman's attention?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Is it not also a fact that from 1870 to 1880 there was a tariff more than twice as high as that which was in existence from 1850 to 1860? Besides that we did not resume specie payments until 1879.

Mr. DAVIS. Still the value of money was dropping all the time until we reached the gold basis.

Mr. HEMPHILL. My answer is this: That a great war and the dropping of currency to a hard-money basis ought to affect everybody else as well as the farmers, whereas in the twenty years to which I have called attention the farmers did not make but one-sixth the progress of other people. Now, it is true the coming down of the currency affected all, but if it bore six times as hard upon the farmers as upon other people, and that seems to be the gentleman's theory, it seems they were the people who needed some protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

To complete this portion of the argument it is only necessary to say that during the ten years from 1850 to 1860, when the farmers increased their wealth 100 per cent., we were under the low-tariff laws of 1846 and 1857, the average duty under the former being about 26 per cent., and under the latter about 20 per cent.; while from 1860 to 1880, a period of twenty years, during which the farmers, being one-half of the population and starting with one-half the wealth, gained only about one-sixth as much as the other half of the population, we were under the Morrill tariff of 1860 and its amendments, the average duty being over 42 per cent.

Under a low tariff, 1850 to 1860, the farmers increased their wealth 100 per cent.; in the next ten years, 1860 to 1870, with a tariff nearly twice as high, they increase only 39 per cent., and in the succeeding ten years, 1870 to 1880, under the same high tariff, they increase only 9 per cent.

Seeing what a wreck he has made of agriculture, how he has robbed the toiling millions who through winter and summer must labor in the open fields, we might conceive how a protectionist could brace himself up to continue quietly and away from the public view to enjoy the fruits of his unjust and unfair exactions; but it would seem that nothing but inordinate vanity, born of undue self-esteem and long shielded by protection from the depressing effects of foreign competition, and especially from the "pauper modesty of Europe," could ever induce any such man to parade himself before an intelligent public in the sham character of the farmer's best customer. The thing would be absolutely ridiculous if it were not unfortunately so exceedingly expensive.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In that you take in all the Confederate States, those that were claiming to be out of the Union?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes; from 1860 to 1870, as I have said, the comparison is not altogether satisfactory, because, of course, the labor was lost in the South, and other disturbing conditions prevailed, as I have said. Between 1850 and 1860 and between 1870 and 1880 there is a fair comparison.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that many people have gone out of farming avocations because under a protective system they have found more profitable avocations in which to enter? And is it not also true that if by free trade or any other process you increase the number of farmers and decrease the number of manufacturers do you not necessarily reduce the paying consumers and give the farmers less prices for their commodities instead of better?

Mr. HEMPHILL. If you will give the farmers a chance to deal with the whole world—give them open markets—the farmers will take care of themselves. You need not be afraid of that.

Mr. MILLIKEN. They may sell to the whole world now if they please. We have no export duties.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But we can not sell unless people want to buy. It does not take much of political economy to enable a man to understand that much.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Trade is not barter, and has not been since the invention of money. And the fact of the matter is that we sell the most now where we buy the least. We buy largely from South America and from China and the West Indies, in which countries the balance of trade is over $100,000,000 against us.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will endeavor to show the gentleman in a few moments as I proceed to what this line of thought leads.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a moment. I understand him to hold that the Mills tariff bill is favorable to the farming interests in the United States?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think anything that reduces tariff taxes is favorable to the farmers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Even if it reduces the protection the farming interests now have? I think the gentleman would have some difficulty in convincing the farmers of my district of that fact.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, well, yours are not on the same line as mine. All we want is an open market.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You have an open market now. The farmers in my part of the country would be hard to convince of the propriety of the position the gentleman takes.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, you may have a few farmers in your district, scattered here and there; but I speak for the great mass of the farming community of the country.

Having seen the destructive effect of high protection upon the agricultural interests of this country, let us examine briefly the changes in our foreign commerce for the past thirty years in so far as we are interested in the transportation of it. In 1856 the value of the total imports and exports of the United States amounted to $641,604,830, of which American vessels carried $482,268,274, or a little over 75 per cent. of the whole. In 1887 our total imports and exports reached the sum of $1,408,502,979, of which there was transported in American vessels $194,356,746, or only a fraction over 13 per cent.

In a few more years we will reach the descending climax, in which we will present to the world the humiliating spectacle of a great and proud nation, with a population of 60,000,000 of people and a foreign commerce of $1,500,000,000 annually, of which we will carry the value of not one cent. It is estimated that we pay in freight money to foreign vessels $140,000,000 to $160,000,000 annually, which ought to be, and would no doubt be, largely paid to owners of American vessels were, it not that everything and everybody in this country must surrender their rights and their property to the manufacturers.

I am not prepared to maintain that this almost total loss of our carrying trade is wholly due to the protective tariff, but that the very high duty placed upon all materials from which vessels are constructed has produced this result in the main I have no doubt. And when we come to balance up the business in this country and set over against the increase in manufactures, if any, the loss in our agriculture, carrying trade, and other occupations, there is no doubt in my mind that the country is less prosperous to-day than it would have been without protection.

It would be impossible, of course, within the proper limits of a speech to discuss the numerous untenable grounds upon which this unjust law is maintained. To enumerate them simply "would weary your indignation," and to take the time to refute them would exhaust your strength and patience. It may, however, be stated that while the protective laws are said to be for the benefit of the laborer, are claimed to diversify industries, to protect us from foreign competition, and to have many other virtues, no one has yet been found bold enough to assert that it has the one essential element of all honest laws—that of equal justice to all men. In fact, protection is founded on injustice, and unless it produces inequality it fails of its purpose, deceives its friends, and belies its very existence.

The population of South Carolina is about one-fiftieth of that of the entire Union, and if we contribute by the purchase of protected goods in proportion to our numbers we must pay annually under the tariff laws about $16,000,000. But as the amount directly contributed under this system depends upon the purchases made by the citizens of the four thousand protected articles, and as our people are in impoverished circumstances and their ability to purchase thereby diminished, it is not likely that they contribute the full $16,000,000. It may be safe to say, however, that they do contribute two-thirds of this sum, or say $10,000,000, of which $2,500,000 goes to the support of the Government and $7,500,000 to the enrichment of the manufacturers and other protected citizens. If the people of my State pay their proportion, according to population, of the internal-revenue tax, which is derived from whisky and tobacco, their payments on this account amount to about $2,000,000, which, added to the $10,000,000 paid under the tariff, makes the total of $12,000,000 which the impoverished and tax-ridden people of South Carolina annually pay for the support of the Government and for the enrichment of the favored few who by some inscrutable Providence have been able to possess themselves of the taxing power of this Government with which they wring from the toiling millions of this country the fruit of their honest labor.

Comparing these figures with the statistics furnished by the census of 1880 we learn that the people pay annually under Federal taxation sixteen times as much as they pay into the State treasury, and ten times as much as the total State and county tax, and within the last eleven years the people of South Carolina have paid in Federal taxes an amount equal to the entire assessed value of the real and personal property of the State.

The annual cotton crop of South Carolina sells for about $20,000,000. So that our annual payments under the tax system of the General Government largely exceed the half of the value of the entire cotton crop of the State.

It is for these people especially that I plead; these who have so long borne this grievous burden of taxation, but who still courageously contend in the great battle of life, against the mighty odds that unfavorable seasons, adverse circumstances, and an unjust Government have placed upon them, and I challenge every man upon this floor who hates iniquity and loves justice to rally to the support of this meaure which tends to give some relief to that great class of our citizens who have for so many years labored under this burden that is almost too heavy to be borne. I do not and they do not complain against the just and proper taxation necessary to support their Government, but they have complained and will complain against that monstrous wrong by means of which the taxing power of the Government is delivered over to a few men to enable them to gather where they have not strewn and reap where they have not sown.

Many of the farmers of South Carolina were last year assembled in convention at the capital of the State for the purpose of devising ways and means to improve their condition, and to suggest, if practicable, some mode of lessening the State and county taxes.

But it seems to me that the first essential element of permanent improvement amongst agriculturists, mechanics, merchants, and professional men alike is the reduction of Federal taxes. It is right here, and upon this floor, that the great contest for the relief of the people is to be conducted. If it is wisely, persistently, and courageously fought we must eventually win, because "the people are mightier than the king."

I would not be considered as desiring to criticise harshly the manufacturers, nor as saying that they are worse than other citizens of the country, but I do say that they and others in like position have for years enjoyed, and do now enjoy, under the laws of this country, immense advantages over their fellows, which, as a matter of justice and right, they are not entitled to, and which it is the duty of the independent Representatives of the people upon this floor to see that they do not enjoy in the future.

If we take a calm view of our affairs as they stand related to this question of the reduction of taxes it certainly presents a unique and anomalous condition. We have two great parties, one contending for a reduction of taxes and the other resisting it with all the power and influence it can command, and even clamoring for more, although there is already in the Treasury a surplus over needs of many millions of dollars. Is it not passing strange when the people can not have their taxes reduced although the requirements of the public service have been more than met?

Why can not we reduce the taxes?

The reason assigned by the protectionist is, that it will ruin the business of the country. Is it possible that the lifting of a burden and an expense from the people and the denial to them of the privilege of paying millions of unused dollars into the public Treasury will prove their destruction? There must be some other explanation of this thing. That the tax-payers, who really pay the taxes, should cry out for more is absolutely incredible. But what is it that makes this burden so sweet to those who are standing out against the reduction? The explanation is very simple when once understood, and it lies in the fact that these taxes that are levied by public enactment do not go into the public Treasury, but they go into the pockets of private citizens, and the very men who are to reap the reward of this scheme are here either in person or by their Representatives to vote upon the measure. So that the difference between these Representatives and myself is, that every dollar I can save to my constituents is a dollar lost to theirs, and every dollar they can wrench from mine, either justly or unjustly, under this law, goes to enrich theirs.

These gentlemen, then, are not here under the grave responsibility of voting to place a burden upon the shoulders of their constituents, but rather are voting to put money into their pockets for which they have not struck one lick of honest work. Does any one express surprise, then, that the manufacturers of this country manifest the liveliest interest in any efforts to alter the tariff laws?

Of all the working people in the United States every single one of them is an enforced contributor to the support of the manufacturers. In fact, there is not a man, woman, or child of the 60,000,000 inhabiting this broad land who has on this day or on any day for the past twenty-five years performed one moment's labor toward providing the necessities or comforts of life who has not contributed to the support of this petted class of our citizens. Not a dollar, not a cent has been spent in this country for the past quarter of a century in the purchase of any of the enumerated articles which has not gone in part to the enrichment of these people. And these immense contributions, coming from every quarter of these United States, from every State, city, town, village, and hamlet, from every home in this broad land, from every man, woman, and child in it, has been flowing with an unceasing current for years into the coffers of the manufacturers, and all under the transparent sham of protecting American labor.

No wonder that the manufacturers have heretofore stood an unbroken phalanx against every effort to alter or amend this law, and have persistently misrepresented, maligned, and abused those who have endeavored to secure some relief from the exactions placed upon us.

Surely nothing could illustrate more forcibly the total and absolute perversion of the very principles of our institutions than to see the laws of the land, which should be a shield and protection for all, given over into the power of a few men and converted into an engine of oppression by which the stroke of one man's arm is coined into dollars for another.

It seems to me that human ingenuity can not devise a system of taxation more unjust, unreasonable, unfair, and unrighteous.

In view of these enormities I do appeal most earnestly to every gentleman upon this floor who has the faintest conception of justice to lend his aid to this bill, that seeks in some measure at least to lift from the bowed-down necks of the people the burdens that have been laid upon them.

What we demand is the inalienable right of purchasing in that market where our money will bring the greatest quantity of the necessaries of life; and that must be a very late, lingering, and wizened up specimen of poor humanity whose soul does not go out to a people who are making one more strenuous effort to secure this one right of every freeman. It would seem that even the protected pets of the Government, if they have any bowels of compassion, would be moved to vote for the comparatively small relief proposed by the pending bill when they have once heard the piteous cry of the people for a fair and even chance in the great race of life and for the restoration in part at least of their long-lost rights.

I hesitated to address the House upon this important theme, knowing that many others far more experienced than myself desired to participate in the great debate; but I feel that it is the duty of every man on proper occasions to say something or do something or suffer something for liberty's sake. And remembering how long the people of my State have suffered under this grievous burden I have felt bound to say something by way of exposing the very flimsy and miserable pretexts under which this system of taxation is maintained, and contribute something, possibly, towards its amelioration. For the maintenance of justice, the vindication of right, and the establishment of this Government once again on the everlasting principle of equal rights to all men is well worthy of the ambition and the life work of the best, the wisest, and the truest of American citizens; and it ought to be a sufficient eulogy for any man, it will certainly be sufficient for me, if when the trials and tribulations of this life are over, when its triumphs and failures are ended, when earth's work is done, if it can be truly said of me that as long as God gave me strength I had contended for the liberties of the people against the tyranny of their unjust oppressors. [Applause].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, the shrewd and skillful tactics of our free-trade opponents so mix and obscure facts and arguments in treating the tariff question that it is difficult to keep before Congress and the people the simple rules and principles which should guide in solving this problem in political economy. Like the cuttle-fish, which hides in waters discolored from its own ink-bag, they spread obscurity over the subject from their Cobden Club inkstands and presses with the same purposes as their great leader, to "divide and conquer."

The contest is as old as the times of the early colonies, when England declared that they should not be permitted to make even a "hobnail;" and the methods of conducting it are not of recent importation. We find in an Edinburgh magazine of many years ago some verses entitled "The Quaker's Lament," a verse or two from which will be found suggestive of the sources of some more recent enthusiasm in favor of free trade:

All the mills were closed at Rochdale,
  Shut the heavy factory door;
Young and old had leave to wonder,
  There was work for them no more.

And at length we gained the battle,
  Oh, how proudly did I feel
When the praise was all accorded
  To my brother chief, by Peel!

But I did not feel so proudly
  At the settling of the fee;
Cobden got some sixty thousand,
  Not a stiver came to me.

* * * *

Well, they might have halved the money,
  Yet I know not—and who cares?
After all, the free disposal
  Of the gathered fund was theirs.

* * * *

Yet they gave him sixty thousand,
  Not a penny-piece to me.

The Cobden Club is well named, and the source of the "gathered fund" seems inexhaustible so long as laboring men, the bone, sinew, and glory of our free land, can be misled to adopt free-trade theories under its false teachings.

I have heard that coal-miners out on a strike, after weeks of idleness and resulting loss in wages, have discovered that some of the leaders have been bribed to keep them idle for the benefit of rival coal-dealers who supplied the markets of their employers. So among leaders of modern Democracy, may not some be influenced, unconsciously of course, by self-interest, to yield our markets to foreign rivalry under the specious plea that Europe can supply us with cheaper goods?

It is not the manufacturer who is most interested in this subject of protection. The mill-owner suspects that the competition of his neighbors will interfere more with his markets and profits at home than does the mill of any foreign rival, and is not sure but that less competition here might give him cheaper labor and higher prices. Not all of them look so far as to comprehend the effect of driving off the best customers for domestic goods by the discharge of thousands of laboring men and families from steady and profitable employment.

Mathew Carey, the ardent and early Irish advocate of the interest of labor, wrote nearly sixty years ago:

Except about twenty or thirty persons, there is not, I am satisfied, a manufacturer in the United States who has expended in this cause one-half so much as I have paid for the mere paper on which I have written.

Is it not so now? Each one applies economic principles to his own business first, and cares little about the general application which must increase competition at home. The one who has grown rich in business will not mourn over a crusade against the tariff, though it results in the destruction of the iron mills in Pennsylvania and turns thousands of laborers out from comfortable homes and good wages to compete with the labor of foreign mills or to starve.

This bill is not a reform measure in the interest of our people, but it is a blow at the dignity of American labor. It is an attack upon a system of protection which has brought comfort and even luxuries to thousands of homes in this land of the free of which our fathers never dreamed.

The false teachings that men who employ labor will ruin their own business to reduce wages and oppress the poor can only result now, as in former times, in the loss of confidence, loss of employment, the hunger of idleness, all traceable to the action of the "ill-informed and reckless revolutionists" in attempting, as in this bill, to destroy under cover of reform.

After centuries of most exclusive legislation to build up the industries of England and supply the markets of the world, after wars of startling magnitude waged in command of trade, the independence of her American colonies threatened her monopoly of our markets.

That we could govern ourselves might be a relief to her exchequer, but the loss of trade through our growing independence of her looms and forges was not to be tolerated.

As she can hardly again send her armies and her navy to compel our trade, as in Egypt, the Indies, China, and Japan, she compromises by sending her Cobden Club to preach reform, with unlimited means from fresh "gathered funds" to attract attention.

The contest that produced the "Quaker's Lament" and yielded to Mr. Cobden a fee of £60,000, is fully recorded, with its evil results, by a writer in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine of July, 1849, quoting from a speech in Parliament made on the Liberal side by one of the ablest of the Liberal party:

That the repeal of the navigation laws was the crowning of the column of free trade.

It adds:

There is no doubt it was so, but it was something more. It was not only a carrying out of a principle, but the overthrow of a system. It was not only the crowning of the column, but the crushing of the pedestal.

So American workingmen will find that tariff reform as proposed by the bill under consideration will not only carry out the principle of free trade, but must ultimately crush the pedestal upon which is supported our glorious American system.

As England abandoned her protection policy she established her empire in India. The victory on the Indus was contemporary with the repeal of the navigation laws on the Thames. The completing of the conquest of India occurred exactly at the moment when the system which had created that empire was repudiated.

To the markets of Europe, Asia, Africa, and South America England would secure control of and add ours. Not content with fleecing four-fifths of the world she sighs for the fleece of our little pet lamb, and with true John-Bull shrewdness calculates that the cost of liberal subsidies to politicians and presses will be much less than the increased budget for a military campaign and much more certain of favorable results.

The Tariff Commission, selected from the able men of all parties, labored faithfully to correct the evils complained of in the tariff which has given so many prosperous years, and the tariff of 1883 was adopted as the law of the land. But it does not satisfy the reformers, because the dominant faction in the Democratic party is determined to secure ad valorem duties which comes as near free trade as they can hope, and they press upon Congress and the nation the bill now before the House.

When John C. Calhoun led South Carolina into rebellion, by nullifying the revenue laws enacted in 1828, which were based upon the protective principles of specific duties, the whole country was in commotion. General Andrew Jackson, then President, said:

If John C. Calhoun and his friends do not submit to the laws, by the Eternal! I'll hang him as high as Haman! It is tariff now, some time it will be slavery, but it is a conspiracy to break up this Union.

A prophetic utterance of the old hero. The excitement culminated in a compromise. The Whig party, yielding to a Southern clamor, consented to revise the tariff of 1828; and in 1833 a bill was rapidly passed through Congress, the compromise consisting in a change from the specific duties to the revenue standard of ad valorem, at first as high as those of 1828, but to be annually reduced until, in 1842, they should reach a settled point of 20 per cent. horizontal.

Here was a fair trial of the principles opposed to protection, and the result was fairly recorded. In 1836 it was in full tide of unsuccessful experiment. The duties on imported goods, gradually reduced, had reached a point where the foreign maker could afford to pay them and risk the sale of his inferior stock and remnants, and they soon flooded our markets, to be sold to the highest bidder on the usual credits. It seemed the heyday of prosperity and speculation to rejoice the hearts of all reformers.

The year 1837 opened brightly; money apparently abundant; stores were filled with cheap goods, and innumerable State banks of issue supplied currency to buy with.

Before the summer of that year which opened so auspiciously had fairly dawned all was terror, confusion, and ruin.

The notes given for the foreign goods bought at auction must be paid in something better than the rags of State banks, which had nearly all suspended specie payment, and many failed and were worthless, leaving only the memory of equally worthless promises to remind men of their former existence. No currency, no credit, no work, nothing but widespread ruin.

Where was the promise of the free-trade theorist that it meant only free exchange, and that no more goods could be brought here than could be paid for in goods made here? England sent us in 1836 $86,000,000 worth of goods, while she took of us only $1,684 worth of breadstuffs.

Mills were closed, looms and spindles silent, and in many cases were sold by sheriff or constable to collect notes given by manufacturers for raw material and wages for their workmen. Why?

Not because our factories could not make goods cheap enough, but because the shelves of old customers were filled from the auction sales.

"We can sell as low as you paid at auction." "But we have no room for more if you could give them to us," was the reply. Workmen were discharged unpaid, to suffer because labor had been employed abroad to furnish goods which should have been made here.

This is all matter of history, and was the result of Democratic legislation half a century ago, crowning the column of free trade with fraud and crushing the pedestal of protection under false appraisements at the custom-house.

When, in 1844, the Democratic party entered the Presidential campaign flaunting banners bearing the legend, "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of '42," and claimed that James K. Polk was a better tariff man than Henry Clay, it intended to deceive. They defeated Mr. Clay and then broke their pledge to the people in 1846, changing the tariff by substituting ad-valorem duties and custom-house oaths for the plain, honest, specific duties which rendered such frauds almost impossible under the tariff of 1842.

In every case and every age of the long struggle we find the issue to be Democracy, ad-valorem duties, and fraud versus specific duties and protection to honest labor and trade. And in every success of the Democracy they have led us to financial ruin, failures in business, and loss of employment to labor. And yet this bill is urged upon the country to reform alleged abuses and assure workmen that they can command better wages if the country is flooded with foreign goods and our gold taken abroad to pay for them.

It is alleged that "a tariff oppresses the poor." That "any tariff increases the cost of living, because the duty must be added to the price of every article consumed here."

Again, the reformer asks exultantly, what is the use of a tariff for protection if it does not increase profits by giving the manufacturer a higher price? History shows that nails, window-glass, and products of the loom protected by the tariff of 1816 sold for less than the duty imposed. This result is founded in reason. Well-paid labor makes good customers and increases demand, which in return requires increased production, which reduces cost and affords better profits at lower prices.

The more complete protection afforded by the Morrill tariff of 1861 has worked greater miracles in the past twenty years. Give to American workmen a market for their products and they will take care of the wages. The object of protective duties is not to raise the price of goods, but to secure to labor the market.

The moment we establish a duty, the price is reduced by the foreign maker in the struggle to keep our markets. Take steel rails, a striking example of the effects of protection. The agitation for protection lowered the foreign price from $150, gold, long before our mills began to roll them. Soon the price delivered here was below $100. So the duty of $27.50 was not added to the price. Reduced by the tariff of 1883 to $17, it is yet called infamous because the free-trader declares rails at $26.50 a ton, less than the original duty, the consumer must pay the duty. Surely nobody believes that. Does any one conceive the possibility of such reduction in price if we had not established the manufacture by protective duty? Yet the free-trader denounces it as infamous because customs revenues decrease! More customs duties with lower duties must mean more foreign goods to fill our markets.

That is just what the friends of this bill are working for. Protection, at any point under prohibition, must always reduce prices, first under foreign competition and later under home competition. If one man is making money too fast other capital will take a hand, and then in the competition for more workmen wages must improve.

A learned professor trained his free-trade batteries upon the manufacturers of spool-cotton thread in defense of poor sewing women, who, the professor says, are compelled to pay the oppressors a tax of 1¼ cents per spool more than it is worth at retail. He said:

> No doubt it could be sold for 3 cents a spool, now it costs 5 cents.

With great prudence the professor sets down just what the expenses should be, and then calculates the profits to suit his case, even to a quarter of a cent. With a wonderful display of originality he exclaims, in an address February 7, 1883:

> The first garment a baby puts on, and the last a dead man is clothed in, must be made of thread.

The Willimantic Linen Company of Connecticut was the target at which the sympathetic professor aimed, and it seemed reasonable to learn their side of the story. They responded courteously and promptly to the inquiries as to the cause and amount of protection and its effects on prices.

In beginning the industry, the company learned that wages of labor at Paisley, Scotland, was 15 cents per dozen spools of thread, less than they were paying, and they asked of Congress a duty of 15 cents a dozen to cover that difference. The list price of a dozen spools of cotton thread, 200 yards each, was then 85 cents. According to free-trade calculations the duty must be added to the price of all sold, whether domestic or imported, making a dozen spools cost $1. But sixteen hundred operatives having good wages, comfortable homes, schools, play-grounds, concerts of music, and churches of their own, were able to afford thread when this tariff reform began at a reduction in price of 30 cents; double the amount of the (added) duty. In 1876 the price had been reduced to 65 cents per dozen, and at the time they gave the information to 55 cents.

Why the professor should go out of his way to misrepresent such an industry as a tariff fraud is a problem not easily solved.

Mr. Thomas H. Dudley, of Camden, N. J., consul at Liverpool under Mr. Lincoln's administration, in an address before the New York Association for the Protection of American Industry, said:

> The great power she (England) is now using is the Cobden Club. No political organization that I know of has so much wealth, power, and influence. It has a professor of political economy at Yale, and one at Williams College, who are members of the club.

So it was this great political power which misrepresented the Willimantic spinners.

It will not be amiss to look over figures made in the past. During the years 1829 to 1832, inclusive, our imports from Great Britain amounted to $142,000,000. Our exports of breadstuffs to Great Britain were $9,500,000.

From 1835 to 1838, inclusive, imports, $253,000,000, while the exports of breadstuffs were but $94,629.

In 1836 we purchased from Great Britain $86,000,000 worth of goods, and sold to her the value of $1,684 in breadstuffs.

Another curious fact in this connection is that in 1845 the State of Massachusetts took products of the other States to the value of $40,000,000, three times the amount of exports to all parts of the world, cotton included.

Compare these figures, and decide which can best be depended upon by our farmers—protection to American industry or the bill under consideration which promises free trade to the country under cover of Democratic revenue reform.

It is the employed labor here that consumes provisions raised here, and the maker of spool-cotton thread is not the only laborer here that is paid at the rate of 15 cents a dozen more than his less fortunate brother in Paisley, and eats his white bread and roast beef instead of oat-meal porridge. England can buy grain in Europe and the East at lower prices than our farmers can afford to sell for and pay the cost of sending it abroad.

The wealthy traders of England understood human nature well, and broke down protection there, as the Cobden Club is doing here, by creating jealousies of class against class. The laborers in towns wanted cheap bread, and joined the traders in repealing corn laws. Then it was easy to excite the farmers against the manufacturers.

Here the grangers are excited against the railroads, without which their farms are worthless, and against the factory workmen who shut them from the foreign markets by protection laws.

I would suggest for thoughtful consideration, that the great prosperity of the country under our protection laws enables well-paid labor in all industries to own their own homes, to clothe and educate their children to an extent never before known, and creates a market here tenfold more valuable than any that could be offered under free trade.

"History is philosophy teaching by example," said an ancient Greek historian. We have many examples to learn from in deciding questions of political economy.

Almost a century before the colonies in North America declared themselves independent, an Irishman carried over to Portugal workmen from England, and set up manufactories. An English publication said:

> The Portuguese went on successfully; their manufactures of woolen clothes increased to that degree that both Portugal and Brazil were wholly supplied from their own fabrics, and the materials of this manufacture were of their own and Spanish wool, and no other.

The Portuguese prohibited all manufactures coming in competition with their own, but in 1703 the British minister, Mr. Methman, induced her to enter into a treaty, called by his name, which stipulated that she should never prohibit British woolen manufactures, provided port wines were admitted into Great Britain at two-thirds of the duty paid on those of France. They were made to believe not only that a market was secured for their wines, but that they would buy their cloths at reduced prices.

Adam Smith had not then written, but they learned without him to "buy where goods could be had cheapest." The English publication quoted adds:

> During the twenty years of prohibition the Portuguese succeeded so well in their woolen manufactures that we brought hence no gold or silver, but after taking off that prohibition we brought away so much of their silver as to leave them very little, and then we began to bring away their gold.

England learned the lesson taught by her success in Portugal better than we; at least she better profits by the example. She fills our commercial centers with Methmans and our colleges with professors, who teach shrewdness under the name of his most successful scholar.

Thousands of honest, patriotic men here are beguiled into the belief that we buy where we can buy cheapest at foreign mills, even if we lose all the benefits through the loss of employment to the laboring population and have nothing left wherewith to purchase at any price. But where can we buy cheaper than in the market which gives us all employment at fair wages?

It is interesting and instructive to read the debates in Congress during the protracted struggle for complete independence, from the days of colonial rule to this year of 1888. The same objections, the same misstatements, the same arguments, playing off the supposed interests of one section against the other, the prejudices of one people against the other, the jealousies of workmen against employers, the same interference with the finances year after year, and all springing from the same stubborn determination of our English cousins to recover control of our American markets and enjoy the profits under English vines and fig-trees.

Pennsylvania, with her vast area of coal and inexhaustible beds of iron ore, early became a manufacturing State. The only available mines of anthracite coal, the purest known in the world, lie within her borders. With an intelligent, moral, and industrious population as a manufacturing community, we have always been foremost amongst the advocates of protection to American industries.

In the name of that great Commonwealth I protest against the passage of this bill. It will destroy our industries, impoverish our farmers, and degrade our labor.

It is not American.

Representatives of a mighty people, I appeal to you by every sacred memory in the past, by every hope for a glorious future of our beloved country, show yourselves great enough to appreciate the blessings of our American institutions, wise enough to legislate for the happiness, prosperity, and glory of the American people, patriotic enough to stand by the independence, the dignity, the honor, and the homes of American workmen.

This is not a question in which one State is interested above another State. It is the United States against all the world.

Come what will, I am for the Union and protection to American trade and labor. [Applause.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, December 20, 1887.

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

Mr. HUDD. Mr. Chairman, it is said that both great political parties are pledged to revenue reform; that in the face of an annual surplus of $60,000,000—over $1,000,000 a week, about $140,000 a day, over $5,800 an hour, withdrawn and unnecessarily held from use and circulation among the people—neither of the contestants for political favors could well appear indifferent, so both were compelled to declare in some form on this seeming to become the paramount question of any political campaign. We will reduce the burden of unnecessary taxes on the people by striking out as far as possible the custom-house duties that press heaviest on the labor class—by its duties on the necessaries of daily life, on food, clothing, home and business comforts—so that we may cheapen the cost of living and not hamper the industries in mere aid of capital where the fair and just discriminations may be made; says, in effect, as in the Democratic declaration of a political independence that was adopted at Chicago when Mr. Cleveland was well and successfully named for the Presidency.

Said the Republicans in a convention that was not as successful in the naming of a President, but that did declare for some reduction of Federal revenue taxation, but as read in the declaration itself—their platform, and as construed by all their leaders and doctrinaires—it is for such reduction, not commencing at the door of or on the line of the customs on importations, but with the internal-revenue tax-gatherer. Free whisky and liberated tobacco is in the air as the panacea for the threatened further conjestion of the financial health of the Union.

I speak by the card when I say that the leaders of that whilom great party, that borrowed its name of Republican from the original Democratic idea that organized parties and political associations for national ends and patriotic purposes, are committed to the abolition of the internal-revenue taxation in lieu of any general attack on the customs, for that would interfere with their pets,

THE OVERGROWN INFANTS.

That are continually astonishing their political teachers—apt pupils of crafty masters, with their more than Oliver Twist simplicity "of asking for more"—protection.

Here is the significant and no uncertain sound that comes from these same leaders. Let us look at only two illustrious samples and they will well and fully average up and answer for the party in which they are trusted leaders and possible Presidents (for candidacy only), to the point that the Republican party are in fact hostile to any substantial tariff reform; consider the subtle utterances of Senator SHERMAN at the Home Market Club gathering in well-protected Boston, State of Massachusetts:

The tariff ought to be carefully revised with a view to correct any irregularities or incongruities that have grown out of the changes of value since the passage of the act of 1883.

So far we observe, as the fact is, that the Senator is still wedded to the principles of that same tariff revision of 1883, that, it is claimed, is one of the many pernicious acts of tariff legislation that has caused the popular rising of the masses to demand its substantial repeal. So far as SHERMAN can speak for the Republican party, and who doubts his commission to that high place of heir-apparent, the anxious I am to be your candidate, since that bleak day in January when from across the sea came not our American poet Poe's,

A wind came out of the sea by night
Killing and chilling my Annibel Lee, but a most chil-blain kind of an air that rang

Our Jamie on the stormy sea of doubt and uncertainty, and therefore wisely declines. "Your candidate I can not be," alas! has been said before by as illustrious a politician, gone, but never forgotten; no, never, while a Democratic memory remains of that good man and elevated statesman, Horatio Seymour. Blaine's declination may also be writ in water; as it comes to them across a waste of that same unstable material. Circumstances may change declinations. But to return to the "Barkis that is willin." Speak again, JOHN SHERMAN:

Every imported article that does not compete with our domestic industry, and is essential to the comfort and wants of our people should be placed on the free-list.

Ah, there, the wise and super-subtle Ohioan knows, as he has declared by his legislative acts, that the great list of over four thousand articles listed and taxed at the seat of the customs is held by him and his political brethren to compete with our domestic industries, so there is small help for the tax-payer here. Let us follow their leader to his tariff climax.

Every raw material of industry which does not compete with our own industry should be specially selected for the free-list.

Ah, there, again, most grave and reverend Senator, you should also have given, as I do now, the sotto voce of the distinguished speaker, namely:

And I know that will make a mighty small free-list.

So much for the main premise, that the Republican leaders do not intend any substantial

RELIEF OF THE CUSTOMS BURDEN.

Now for the minor key that they would strike to appear to keep the word of promise in the hope of a reduced surplus, while breaking it constantly to the ear and eye of the reader and searcher for a remedial statute. They will favor a repeal of all the internal-revenue laws, take the tax off whisky and tobacco, because by so doing they expect to prevent such a revision of the tariff as is now demanded by the great mass of tax-payers in these United States.

Our internal-revenue receipts are approaching $120,000,000 per annum. If that amount is struck from the revenues of the Government it will be as much, if not more, than will be asked for. The ordinary and necessary expenses of the Government must be met, and these now and for many years to come will include the interest on the public debt and the pension-list. These two items now aggregate $123,000,000, a little more, it will be seen, than our internal-revenue tax collection for last year; but it must not be forgotten in this connection that we have what are called "miscellaneous receipts," not derived from customs or internal revenue, that annually amount to $35,000,000, that go to swell our national income, and so render the now proposed custom-house reduction possible and safe.

In 1856–'57 our expenses, exclusive of pensions and interest, were $64,700,000 and our customs receipts $63,800,000. In 1886–'87 the same expenses were $193,000,000 and customs receipts $217,000,000. In 1857 our population was about 30,000,000 and in 1887 about 60,000,000. In 1857 the value of our imports upon which duties were levied was $283,000,000; in 1887 it was $458,000,000. During the last thirty years our population has doubled and our net ordinary expenses and customs receipts have more than trebled, while our imports have increased not 62 per cent. That our customs revenues have kept pace with our ordinary expenses is due to the high-tariff rate, which was 47.07 per cent. in 1887, as against 22.45 per cent. in 1857.

Let us now call to the witness stand another illustrious leader of the protection idea. We find in a speech delivered in the United States Senate, April 5, 1888, by Senator WILSON, of Iowa, "the true inwardness" of some of the friends of the people, and who are willing that they, the people, shall drink and smoke in peace, provided that they are content to eat less and be clothed according as they eat, sparingly.

Let the witness be heard:

Mr. President, we are still confronted with an annual surplus revenue of about $60,000,000. Is there no way by which we may get rid of it, without disturbing our true industrial conditions? It seems to me there is a way which is both short and clear. We have one public tax the gross yield per annum of which more than equals the reduction of revenue we are called on to make. The tax on intoxicating liquors is the one to which I refer. There is where I would make the reduction.

Mr. KERR. I would ask the gentleman whether Senator BROWN, of Georgia, does not occupy the same position?

Mr. HUDD. There are no great general rules without some exceptions. There may be some in the Senate.

Now listen to the moral of this

TALE OF A PROHIBITIONIST

From the sometime, but not always, it is to be hoped, to be legally cursed with sumptuary and class legislation, State of Iowa—but showing as clearly as can be shown by the course of events that the Republican party are drifting, if not already on the shoals, where breaks the waves of fanaticism and prohibition, the revamped blue laws that of old times it is said that——

They fined the good man of a Monday
For kissing of his wife on Sunday.

Says this advocate for the coming idea, That will yet dominate the Republican party, and this, the sooner the people understand the better, for a healthful result. Continues the protection witness.

Those who manufacture and deal in intoxicating liquors all seem to favor the preservation of this tax. Why is this so? Persons do not often insist on the imposition of taxes on their business or property. The rule is quite to the contrary, and the removal of a tax is hailed with great satisfaction. Why should this case be so different from all others? Is it not because of the hope these persons have that the reduction of revenue in other directions would result in so firmly imbedding the business of making and selling intoxicating liquors in our revenue system that it could never be disturbed? This is the position it occupies in the revenue system of Great Britain, and who ever hears of a proposition on the part of that government to reduce the taxes on intoxicating liquors? Every other business and interest in the kingdom has been, unconsciously it may be, made into an obstructive force to any reduction of the taxes on intoxicating liquors.

The proportion of revenue which Great Britain derives from intoxicating liquors amounts to something more than one-fourth of the gross revenue of the kingdom, and it has come to be regarded as a fixed and permanent part of the system. A chancellor of the exchequer would as soon think of intefering with the Crown itself as with the liquor taxes. Nor has this economic condition been without its effect on the purposes and habits of that people. The purposes all tend to maintain the traffic and the tax, and steadily but surely the habit of use has grown and the volume of consumption increased. A knowledge of these facts, doubtless, has induced the manufacturers of, and dealers in, intoxicating liquors in this country to take the stand they have of opposition to any interference with the internal-revenue taxes imposed on them. This fact of itself ought to arrest our attention and enforce most patient and thorough consideration of the subject. We are brought face to face with the most malign foe of organized human society. It is the one and only thing with which local communities, States, and the nation have to contend, that subordinates every other interest to the promotion of its own ends. It has no religion, no morals, no politics, except such as it can debase to its own purposes. It has nothing in common with any of those elements and conditions that are essential to the prosperity and happiness of a people. Shall we give to it the enduring support by making it a necessary presence in our revenue system? This question is upon us now. We can not avoid it if we would.

In our consideration of this question we can afford for a time to omit the sentimentalities which crowd upon the mind at every mention of it. As a question affecting our economies and politics it is bad enough. It costs our people nearly $900,000,000 per year. This fact alone is a great economic disturber, for this vast expenditure is never accompanied by any counteracting good. It involves those habits of wastefulness which prevent the acquisition of homes and comforts by tens of thousands of our people who need both and who could have them but for this enemy of correct habits and proper economies. It is the uncompromising enemy of the best type of manhood and citizenship. Whatever of good can be said of it, if such thing there be, can be offset by a multitude of evils. It has no conscience to stay its movements, no matter what calamity they portend.

Can there be any mistake in the portents of these utterances from a leader of the Republican party? Let every man in our broad land that loves personal liberty, as distinguished from the issues that have led such Republican States as Maine, Iowa, Kansas, etc., to pass, in the opinion of many, the domain of fair, honest personal-liberty rights of the citizen, in the unwise and tyrannical invasion of those sacred rights that read in our Magna Charta, born of the best blood and precious lives of the patriots and heroes of 1776, the decree that was written on more than constitutional tablets of stone in the glorious results of the acts of the men who truly lived in the days that tried men's souls, and for all time to admire and be blessed thereby, and that declares:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

How puerile, how simple, when we reflect that for the purposes they claim that the ABOLITION OF THE LIQUOR TAX

Will aid in the suppression of the sale, manufacture, and use of ardent spirits, wines, and beer, when the imposition of the Federal tax gives no license for such manufacture, sale, or use, but that the whole question now legally and constitutionally belongs to the States, that they may prohibit or permit, that all that the Federal tax does is to add to the price of the manufactured or imported beveraged article, and that their repeal, so far as its practical effect, is to make the liquors they decry as the source of so much evil, more easy of use, in that they will cheapen the beverages and make it the drink of the poor man rather than the luxury of the rich one. Let no man be deceived by these false prophets that masquerade in the too scant skin of the moral shepherds, a sentimental wardrobe that can not fail to show the real purpose: to graft a thorn of sumptuaryism on the Federal tree.

I would do justice to a few gentlemen, who, while claiming to be members of the Republican party, yet are now willing to join hands with the almost unanimous body of Democrats, who have placed their shoulders against the car of tariff reform with a purpose to propel it to a final end on the road of a material and perceptible reduction of all burdensome imposts. Notable in this connection are the utterances of Hon. KNUTE NELSON, of Minnesota, in his able speech of March 29, 1888, delivered in the House of Representatives, and who, it is believed, but voices the growing sentiment of the great Northwest—a voice that it may be well for the Eastern and Middle States of this Union to respect as well as listen to; for that part of this land that grows its bread has no uncertain crop of men either that would fain come to the markets of the world with their products for lawful exchanges without profit-destroying tariff tribute, and which West will applaud to the echo the fine peroration of Representative NELSON, namely:

Worthier, better, and juster it seems to my mind would it be to give our people, the toiling masses, cheaper food, cheaper fuel, cheaper clothing, and cheaper shelter, cheaper because released from the heavy and unnecessary burden of high-tariff taxes. I will put free sugar, free coal, free salt, and free lumber against free whisky and free tobacco under all circumstances, and so will the great mass of the American people.

We have looked upon the Republican picture, now let us look for a moment at the other side; and where can we better look to find the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth of this political controversy than in the

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

Of the United States communicated to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, a message that shall stand for clearness of its ideas, terseness of its language, and appropriateness as to time, place, and extent of its utterances as the model declaration of the First Democrat in the land? For we recognize in Grover Cleveland, for the time being, at least, that he stands not only as the executive head of a great nation, but also the trusted exponent after that long interregnum of the Democratic idea of Government—"the greatest good to the greatest number." Says that message:

The difficulty attending a wise and fair revision of our tariff laws is not underestimated. It will require on the part of the Congress great labor and care, and especially a broad and national contemplation of the subject, and a patriotic disregard of such local and selfish claims as are unreasonable and reckless of the welfare of the entire country.

Under our present laws more than four thousand articles are subject to duty. Many of these do not in any way compete with our own manufactures, and many are hardly worth attention as subjects of revenue. A considerable reduction can be made in the aggregate by adding them to the free-list. The taxation of luxuries presents no features of hardship; but the necessaries of life used and consumed by all the people, the duty upon which adds to the cost of living in every home, should be greatly cheapened.

The radical reduction of the duties imposed upon raw material used in manufactures, or its free importation, is of course an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these necessaries; it would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being thus cheapened, that part of the tariff now laid upon such product as a compensation to our manufactures for the present price of raw material could be accordingly modified. Such reduction, or free importation, would serve beside to largely reduce the revenue.

It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufacturers. On the contrary, it would appear to give them a better chance in foreign markets with the manufacturers of other countries, who cheapen their wares by free material. Thus our people might have the opportunity of extending their sales beyond the limits of home consumption, saving them from the depression, interruption in business, and loss caused by a glutted domestic market, and affording their employés more certain and steady labor, with its resulting quiet and contentment.

* * * * * * *

The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers. These things can and should be done with safety to all our industries, without danger to the opportunity for remunerative labor which our workingmen need, and with benefit to them and all our people, by cheapening their means of subsistence and increasing the measure of their comforts.

Sir, to

THE WESTERN FARMER,

Whose land is burdened to Eastern capitalists by mortgages, in favor of men who have grown rich by taxing that farmer's plow, his shovel, his rake, all of his agricultural implements, as well as his clothes, the covering of his bed at night, the lumber in his house, his barn, his fences, the nails that hold them together, the shoes upon his horses' feet, the tin pail in which he milks his cows, in fact, every necessary used upon his farm, in his house, and of comfort to himself, his wife and children, the allies of protection, whether hailing from New England or the iron or coal fields of Pennsylvania, offer at this juncture of public affairs to reduce the tax on whisky and make free trade of tobacco. This is the cup of consolation that is now proffered to the American farmer. The distich that was sung some years ago was not all poetry, but contains considerable facts that read:

Taxed on the coffin, taxed on the crib,
On the old man's shroud, and the young babe's bib;
To fatten the bigot and pamper the knave
We are taxed from the cradle plump into the grave.

Thus has it been and is now that the real labor element of our land, the farmers, have been and are taxed on every hand. Look at this list of necessaries: Blankets taxed 70 per cent.; salt in bulk, 83 per cent.; common window-glass, 80 per cent.; wire rods for fences, 41 per cent.; saltpeter, 111 per cent.; woolen shawls, 88½ per cent. Contrast these few items only with the mockery of the tax on the luxury of the few: Diamonds and other precious stones, 10 per cent.; furs, 20 per cent.; jewelry of all kinds, 25 per cent.; still wine in bottles, 20 per cent. Do not these two lists carry their own comments?

And so, it comes to pass, my friend Farmer Goodman, your very good wife is desirous of purchasing for every-day use, as well as for a winter's day comfort, a woolen shawl. Mr. Republican, protection salesman, says, "Yes, marm; but it is 86 cents tax on the dollar, $4.50 for the shawl untaxed, $8.37 with the tax on." Now enters Mrs. Purseproud, the banker's wife, to purchase a seal-skin saque and she is politely told that she will be only tolled 20 cents on a dollar or 68 cents less than the farmer's wife on her woolen shawl. If the banker's wife may also desire silk stockings she may have them, under the law, 25 cents less tax than the farmer's wife who may desire to purchase worsted or woolen stockings.

Why, the very medicine for the family when sick is put under contribution for the good of the party that is now seeking to return to power by the

DELUSIVE CRY OF PROTECTION

To American manufacturers and much good to American laborers; so the drugs and compounds that are to minister to the ills that flesh is heir to are most outrageously taxed. Castor-oil only carries 110 per cent. and Epsom salts 30 per cent., and the rest of the needful drugs and restorative simples in the same unjust proportion; and as I have already intimated, the capitalists or money kings, the favorites of fortune that can check on the banks, on the credulity as well as on the indulgence of the law-makers, may have their pearls, their diamonds, in fact all the precious stones to wear and the foreign champagne to drink, the adornments, as well as the gratification of the gilded clique, at an average of 10 per cent., together with other kinds and degrees of the ornamental that are classed as jewelry articles at 27 per cent., and other apparel luxuries on a still smaller scale; while of the so-called coarser goods, or still more necessary articles of use and necessity for the laboring man and his family, all bear an average of 40 per cent. above the purchases of the luxurious few; still by the edict of the law, and at the behest of the Republican party, this burden of taxation is put on the laborious many for the benefit of the wealthy few.

Here is an apt illustration that came to my notice the other day, and is the idea of a farmer, communicated to one of the public journals, so apropos to the subject we are discussing that I shall make no apology in borrowing it for and as part of my remarks at this point of the argument:

Let us start a 10-pound piece of flannel on its journey. It costs abroad $3. The duty, 10 cents per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem, is $2.05. Importer adds his 20 per cent. Cost, $3.60, plus tariff, $2.46. The wholesaler adds his cost, $4.32, plus tariff, $2.95.2. The retailer adds his cost, $5.18.4, plus tariff, $3.54.2, and $8.72.6 is the price the consumer finally pays. The duty cost $1.49.2 more than the Government receives, or on these flannels every $4 of duty drags after it $3 of profit. Without a tariff, at the same profit, the goods that in England would cost, at most, $3.60, as there the retailer can buy direct from the manufacturer, would cost here the two profits, and would be sold at $4.32. With but one profit and the tariff they would cost $6.06. At this price the working people of the great cities can sometimes buy with cash to spare and "job lots," but usually, as they buy at the nearest store and often on credit, they pay the same prices the farmers do, and get for $8.75 the same flannel that is retailed abroad at $3.60. As far as that flannel is concerned the workingman's wages must be $10 here when they are $4.13 abroad to have the same purchasing power.

At a recent session of the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, held at Lansing, State of Michigan, the master of that national organization, in his annual address, uses the following language, and he, it would seem from his position as a representative farmer, is competent to speak for the class he represents, namely, the American farmer:

CONDITION OF AMERICAN FARMERS.

An anomalous condition confronts the American farmers. Producing as they do immense crops which constitute the greater part of the wealth of the country, they ought to be prosperous, and they would be if the wealth they produced were properly distributed. The fact that they are not is evidence of great wrong and injustice. What is the matter? By what means are farmers deprived of the rewards of their labors? Disguise the fact as you may, cover it up with sophistry and ingenious technicalities, apologize for it by pleading for other industries and the necessity for internal improvements, etc., still the fact will remain that through class legislation other interests in the distribution of the wealth of the land are enabled to absorb an undue and unjust amount of the products of the farmers. Every other important interest in the land is protected by helpful legislation, while farmers are discriminated against in trade, travel, and taxes. The products of their farms are priced for them by others, as also the articles consumed by them.

So studiously prepared and well arranged is this legislation that it is quite difficult to trace it up and show just how it operates to sap the prosperity of farmers. One says the farmers are not prosperous because railroads are allowed to charge "all the article will bear." Another says it is because farmers are required to pay more than their just share of the State and county taxes. One thinks it is due to the financial policy of the Government. Another thinks it is due to the protection given to our manufactures. Some think it is due to overproduction, while others attribute it to a want of diversity in agricultural productions, etc. Now, if there is any truth in any or all of these reasons, it certainly is the fault of the farmers, as they have the power in their own hands to correct any of the alleged grievances, whether they be in the management of the Government or in the management of their farms. If the Government has failed to give equal protection to our industry we should not complain, nor should we attempt reform by making demands through resolutions on paper; but we should use the power now in our hands and practice what we have been preaching for the last twenty-one years, and elect with our ballots Representatives who will legislate in the interest of agriculture and not against it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me a question?

Mr. HUDD. I do not want you to take up too much of my time. I have some good things of my own that I still want to get in.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. This is an excellent sandwich to place between your remarks. Does the gentleman claim that the meeting of the National Grange at Lansing, Mich., by resolution or otherwise, in any way, shape, or manner condemned the protective idea in vogue in this country for the last twenty years and more, or that it recommended free trade or anything that was like squinting towards free trade? I was present myself.

Mr. HUDD. My understanding is that there was a full declaration on the question of the hardship growing out of high tariff. If the gentleman asks me whether they proclaimed free trade I do not understand that they did, or that we do, or anything like it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. When you admit wool free, is not that free trade in wool? How many things are required to make you a free-trader? Are you not a free-trader to that extent?

Mr. HUDD. Sir, what do the farms of the United States produce? What wealth should be in the hands of the American farmers?

The census of 1880 is one source for us to consult to find the valuable information that exhibits this sum of facts. Our farms then yielded 1,754,861,535 bushels of Indian and other corn; 459,479,505 bushels of wheat; 407,858,999 bushels of oats; 44,113,495 bushels of barley; 19,113,495 bushels of rye; 11,817,327 bushels of buckwheat; 35,205,712 tons of hay; 26,546,378 pounds of hops; 110,131,373 pounds of rice; 169,458,539 bushels of potatoes; 5,737,257 bales of cotton.

We also find, from the same source and for the same period, that we had of working oxen, 993,841; of milch cows, 12,443,120; other cattle, 22,488,550; that we had made 777,250,287 pounds of butter, 27,272,489 pounds of cheese, and of whose values unprotected labor was nearly the entire percentage of such production.

The devout Mohamedan looking towards his East, the Mecca of his faith, cries "God is great and Mohamet is his prophet." The devoted if not as devout Republican leader looks towards his East, the so largely protected seaboard States and prays—some people are so critical as to spell it with an "e" and make it look like prey—in that same connection, "We are the G. O. P.—the grand old party, and protection is our prophet"—and that, too, may be spelt short, like profit on the capitalist's side of the nation's bookkeeping, and practically is. The stale pretense is, and no high-tariff speech is complete without it therein, that we favor this system of taxation of importations in the interests of the laboring men. Protecting the home industry that our laborers may thrive—they have rung this ad nauseam in the ear of a long-suffering people until some have actually come to believe it; for however well the real facts are known to the leaders, the masses of their party are honest and mean to do right. The Ananias and Sapphira Club is of leaders, not followers, among our Republican friends.

You would continue the high-tariff rates in the interest of labor? When the laws you dared enact and that you now cunningly attempt to defend, straining every nerve to maintain, is the dastard's blow at that labor you profane in every pulse of your high-tariff hands that have for a quarter of a century clutched at the throat of real labor—political highwaymen that demanded their money and did take the industrial life of millions of those same workmen you seek to win to your rescue in this impending political revolution.

IS LABOR PROTECTED?

Just look at the list of laborers in the United States of North America who are to be protected by Sherman & Co., an old firm, and not a new invoice since the first goods were put on the shelves, slight reduction in prices of some of the dress-goods and a few necessaries, just to keep trade at the old stand. I borrow some of these figures and language that follow from a reliable source:

The census of 1880 gives the following official and interesting returns of the number of people occupied in pursuing a gainful occupation. The total number was 17,392,099. The division was as follows:

Engaged in agriculture	7,670,493
Professional and personal service	4,074,238
Trade and transportation	1,810,256
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining	3,837,112
Total	17,392,099

But the actual number employed in manufacturing was:

Males above sixteen years old	2,025,335
Females above fifteen years old	531,639
Children	181,921
Total	2,738,895

Now, these 2,738,895 are the actual army, officered and marshaled by protection, to whom the whole population has to pay tribute in the shape of tariff taxes? When we look at this thing calmly we may well subscribe to the sagacity of Mr. Bright, who in one sentence defines the whole situation by describing the protectionists as an organized army, and the bulk of the population as a "mob" of consumers.

What do these figures show; what lessons may be read and not sustain the gospel for protection, either?

First. There are six times more persons not engaged in the labor that it is claimed high tariff will protect, viz, the manufacturing class, than there is in the to-be-cared-for. Then these few are to be protected at the expense of the many.

Second. There are three times more engaged in farming than in manufacturing. It is safe to say that now, nearly eight years since that count of 1880 was made, the farmers of the United States of North America number not less than 8,000,000 of men, and it is capable of demonstration to any one not a candidate for some favor, or in the pay of the high-tariff crowd, that the American farmer has no perceptible protection from the present tariff laws.

Third. That the protected ones in a grand total of 60,000,000 are not to exceed 2,738,895; all are worthy and deserving laborers, but not to be specially favored at the expense of more than 70 per cent. of their overtaxed fellow citizens.

Fourth. It is not true that even this fraction of the laborers are protected or that the boasted system does in fact protect American labor. There have been strikes, lockouts, boycotts, and losses without possible accurate numeration within the past ten years among the so-called labor-protected class. It has been roughly estimated that the money losses alone to these wage-earners in the past twenty-four months alone amount to over $20,000,000, in the face of this tariff that is to protect labor, and yet this enormous waste goes on.

Per contra, the Republican tariff on steel rails and steel, according to an undoubted authority, has made the income of one man in Pennsylvania $5,000 a day and the sweet plum of $20,000,000 for the year's profit likely to drop into the side pockets of that labor benefactor, the owner of the plant; that which the protected workmen were compelled to drop, the liberal boss found.

Protection to American industries? What a painful farce is here attempted to be acted. In one issue of a weekly sheet purporting to be in the interests of the American Iron and Steel Association, a journal edited with consummate ability for its side of the question, the Bulletin, published at Philadelphia, and in a late issue of the 11th of April, 1888, we shall find these significant items, that every to be protected laborer in these United States should clip out and paste in his hat for ready reference when the Republican high tariff for the protection of labor is under discussion:

ITEM ONE.

The managers of the Reading Iron Works, at Reading, Pa., have effected a settlement with their employés by which the latter agree to accept 7½ per cent. reduction in wages. Work will thus be given to 1,000 men who have been idle several months owing to the dullness of trade.

ITEM TWO.

Vesta Furnace, 3 miles west of Columbia, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, shut down last week, and a large number of men are thus thrown out of employment. The cause of the shut-down is due to a strike at the Columbia Rolling Mill, which consumes the iron made by the furnace.

ITEM THREE.

The Elba Iron and Bolt Company, limited, and the Continental Tube Company, both of Pittsburgh, suspended payment on April 7. Their liabilities are reported at $527,000, their assets at $1,000,000. An extension will be asked for. The mills, when in full operation, employ 900 men. Depression in the pipe trade and labor troubles, which compelled the closing of the mills for nearly four months, are said to have caused the embarrassment.

ITEM FOUR.

As the result of a conference between the Knights of Labor and the officials of the North Chicago Rolling Mill Company, the men at the Milwaukee mills on the 6th instant agreed to a reduction of 10 per cent. in wages.

ITEM FIVE.

The two rolling mills at Hollidaysburgh, Pa., and the rolling mill of the Portage Iron Company, at Duncansville, closed down on the 5th instant. The employés, about 600 in all, demanded the Pittsburgh scale of prices, and the owners refused to grant the demand.

ITEM SIX.

The Glendon Iron Company, at Easton, Pa., on April 7 discharged all its men except those employed at one furnace, and put board roofs on all its idle furnaces.

ITEM SEVEN, and a sop for those who declare for duties on lumber and manufactured woods.

The Boston Commercial Bulletin says that at a secret meeting in that city on March 28, a combination was formed which includes nearly all the large sash and blind manufacturers in New England, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. It will cover about 75 per cent. of the goods annually turned out in those districts. Prices will be advanced about 10 per cent., but the scheme will not go into effect until after the spring trade begins. Production will also be regulated. Each establishment pays a certain sum of money into the pool and pays a forfeit if the rules of the combination are broken.

Here it will be well to say a word as to

THE TAX ON LUMBER.

Why should not lumber be placed on the free-list? Or rather it should be preceded by the question, why was it at a late date of our tariff history put into the customs list at $2 per thousand?

It can not be claimed that lumbering, the cutting of logs and their manufacture into the various grades of commercial lumber, was in any sense an infant industry. The fathers of the Republic are sometimes evoked as inaugurating the system in behalf of the then struggling enterprises; did not recognize a weakling in logs or lumber; that was reserved for the wisdom of a later generation, and at the instigation of the owners of plants that had grown to giant enterprises without the mills of tribute that lay in each cent of imposts on that necessary production, the lumber of commerce. The idea was in the avarice of the men already rich, but, like all other men of wealth, still anxious to increase their hoards. The tariff-makers that first imposed $2 per thousand on lumber were not petitioned by any body of farmers, or any number of other laborers; not a man that was an employé merely, asked for that protection; but it was at the instance of the mill and forest owners who saw that in the scramble for some governmental gratuities absolutely attendant on any plan of revenue through custom duties, they might as well be in the pool as the iron, steel, coal, or other needful products, and in this case they knew it was "all grist for their mills."

Wisconsin, that I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, is, or has been, one among the three great lumber-producing States of this Union, namely, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota; and I say boldly and knowingly, now here in my place, that Wisconsin as a State, nor the people thereof, has received the slightest benefit from the tax on foreign lumber, but has always and from the first been subject to a direct loss to the amount of that tax at least, and more, from the consequences flowing therefrom; and aside from the men who are owners of the mills and the forests in that State, not a corporal's guard would have favored the imposition of that tax in the commencement, or will regret its passing to the free-list now.

Afraid of Canada lumber coming in and destroying the industry in Wisconsin? and I use my own State only as an illustration, applicable in the main to all the other States that produce lumber.

How stands the record for Wisconsin? Thirty-five years ago pine lands were sold, or rather given away, by the Government to a few men or corporations at a dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and stumpage could be purchased at 50 cents and a dollar per thousand; so that now almost the entire valuable pine lands are owned or controlled by less than forty men or corporations; stumpage and its equivalent acreage now held at $5 to $8 per thousand, or $75 an acre; the men who have labored, the workman in the woods and mills, and being not far from thirty thousand in number annually, their wages not materially varied from an average of $1 per day during all that time, while lumber was free under the reciprocity treaty with Canada, while it bore, if it bore any thing, the 20 per cent. ad valorem, after the abrogation of the said treaty, and then in all the remaining years $2 impost per thousand.

But the forty men have all grown rich. While a quarter of that number are millionaires to-day the thirty thousand laborers are still workingmen, just as poor as when they slung the first ax to fell the first tree for commerce, while every consumer has paid his $2 per thousand tribute, and it has gone to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Now, if this is the present condition of affairs—and who can successfully deny it?—then as long as all competition is successfully excluded the millmen, as it is familiar to call the great lumber firms that now control the prices of manufactured lumber in the West, will continue to keep the price at high-water mark. Open the door to that competition and make a free market, that same kind of a market in which the farmer and the limited-in-means householder has to sell his products, then a reduction of prices to the consumer will follow; more houses will be built and they will cost less; less millionaires on the list, but more homes for men of moderate means.

Sir, there are two paths opened for the march of political ideas, a right and a wrong road for national growth and individual prosperity, as we may view the means to attain the desired ends of a political victory that shall crown the results for the best good of a whole people. Confronted with a large and growing surplus in our national Treasury, the vexed question is, or should be, what shall be done with the overplus, and what wise act shall intervene to prevent its further growth? All admit that a revenue is needed; no government can be maintained without its aid. Taxation in some form for a revenue is the blood that fills the veins of a governmental polity. Without revenue we may well believe that governmental chaos has come and come to stay in national ruin as well as individual decay. From whom and out of what sources shall that needed revenue come? Every dollar levied upon persons or property not needed for the actual, wise, and economical administration of the government is an unlawful impost and an unjust taking of and from the citizens of any nation.

We have no longer the power to meet this question upon the threshold. It has now for a quarter of a century, or ever since the Republican party came into control of the legislative and administrative offices of the land, been head, shoulders, arms, and whole body of that idea that is now called the protection policy within the sanctuary of the nation, its very chambers of law and executive action. Not content with revenue enough to carry on the affairs of the nation in manner befitting so great and materially progressive a nation as the United States of North America now are, the Republican leaders, their great men of party affairs, declare that it must be the policy of their administration, and they are about to ask the aid of the people to restore their leaders and their political ideas in governmental management, that is to say, in the matter of levying upon the industries of the land, and all taxes or the major percentage of the

for our land's wealth is in fact in those arteries that run full of the enterprises, born of labor, and whose truest pulse is found in the sturdy wrists that scatter the seed, guide the plow, and harvest the breadstuffs of the earth, that levying upon these the current expenses of the nation, not forgetting its pledges to pensioners or creditors who shall have all that is nominated in the bond, they will go beyond the needs of each fiscal period and declare, we would raise prices upon the manufactured articles so that the manufacturer may have a motive to continue to manufacture at home. So they declare that they will subsidize a few enterprises. This is the story in brief, the Republican platform in fact.

Thus they will collect a surplus, over and above the needs of the hour, and say it is good, for it is protection to American labor, which word "protection" is to be like the shibboleth of charity and is to be used to cover a multitude of sins, both of omission and of commission.

Sir, we are about to appear before a tribunal of the most extensive jurisdiction, namely, the constitutional electoral court of the United States of North America, a tribunal that has no parallel in all the past centuries of dead or living nations, as to extent of power that may be exercised by the ballot, that little piece of folded paper that declares the free man's will, to cast out or build up the policy that shall rule the land and guide and guard its citizens for weal or woe.

Progress, in all the essentials of national wealth, or poverty, in mental or material decay of its inhabitants. It was not a political economist that said in substance, Let me write the songs of a nation and I care not who writes its laws. I would rewrite the aphorism, and it should declare, Let me write the laws of a nation that shall enact the greatest good to the greatest number, and I know who will be the benefactor of that people, and so build wise, strong, and beautiful enduring homes for the man of moderate means, and allow even of great fortunes rising on lawful foundations, and where capitalists are safe always, for that capital was not wrung from labor, but won by just acquisitions, in a land where it is to be, as it should be, ever the aspiration of the lowest citizen in name, place, or fortune to aspire to the highest post. So chaste ambition is ever a Democratic virtue. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent the time was extended until Mr. HUDD had concluded.

Mr. MILLS. I ask if any gentleman on the other side of the House proposes to continue the debate this afternoon?

Mr. REED. The gentleman we expected to proceed is not present.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ENLOE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1712) for the erection of a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. 4357) to erect a public building at Allentown, Pa.;

A bill (H. R. 4557) for the relief of George F. Chilton;

A bill (H. R. 6453) granting a pension to George P. Stone;

A bill (H. R. 7546) to amend sections 2595 and 2596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to provide a collector at the port of St. Paul, Minn., and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. 77) providing for a duplication of the compilation of the reports of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1815 to 1877; and

A bill (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog signal, and day beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference for the purpose of promoting arbitration and encouraging reciprocal commercial relations between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, and the Empire of Brazil; insisted upon its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives; asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FRYE, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. BROWN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1158) for the relief of Louis Jacobson.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, for money advanced the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor in building the United States cutter Thomas Corwin, Mr. TAULBEE, Mr. BIGGS, and Mr. HERMANN.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the transaction of business under the special order.

The motion was agreed to, and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

Clerk House of Representatives.

TARIFF.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill 9051, known as the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, it is to be regretted that this question, so important and so varied in its operation, and so exclusively economic in its character, can not be considered separately and apart from other policies affecting the administration of the Government. It is to be the more regretted that local and special interests, often of trivial moment and limited extent, have combined to secure for themselves a too favorable consideration, thereby somewhat marring the symmetry of the bill and so far depriving it of that appearance of fairness and justice, as well to the consumer as to the producer, which is so necessary in order to secure the entire commendation of every one who sincerely desires that taxation should be reformed and reduced.

But the bill points in the right direction, and, if enacted into law, will be so much gained in the effort which has been so long pending to give relief to the people from as an oppressive and unequal burden as has ever been imposed by a representative government in modern times.

The course taken may not be altogether straightforward; but in time, I trust, every departure from correct principle and sound policy will be eliminated until a strictly revenue system shall be attained, resting securely upon the broad and just proposition that the necessaries of life—embracing articles of general use—shall be relieved, so far as may be possible, from every public charge, and that all revenue demanded by an economical administration shall be so collected as to be oppres-ive to none and shall proceed from a duty upon such foreign products as are considered luxuries, whose use is limited to the wealthier classes.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, this as the correct theory of taxation, and when the taxing power is exerted in such a manner as to build up special industries, whether pertaining to commerce, or to manufactures, or to agriculture, to the detriment of those who may not be directly interested in such favored industries; or to promote the prosperity of particular classes at the expense of the great body of the people; or to accumulate in the Treasury a sum larger than may be necessary to defray the expenses of a service honestly, efficiently, and economically performed; then such exercise of power, though under the sanction of law, becomes oppressive, begets extravagance by those intrusted with the disbursement of the public funds, induces corrupt practices in and about the halls of Congress, deadens the popular conscience, and in the end, if persevered in, will convert our free institutions into a gilded despotism.

To the people of the Old World the danger comes in the maintenance of large standing armies, eating up the substance which industry and economy accumulates and menacing liberal institutions; but to ourselves it comes in the guise of an unequal, an unjust, and a too heavy taxation, supplemented by the extravagant and corrupt distribution of the treasure so obtained. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see if the present financial condition of the Government be the result of a policy in strict accord with an impartial and a wise exercise of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution in the matter of taxation. And here there is no need of speculative inquiry or of abstract reasoning. The facts and the figures are before us, and that, too, in the plainest and in the simplest form—so plain and so simple as to be entirely within the easy comprehension of the commonest understanding. With these data well understood, it will not be a difficult task to form a correct opinion as to the true condition of our monetary affairs.

I have been furnished, Mr. Chairman, by the Treasury Department with a statement which I beg leave to read to the committee:

Statement showing the net revenue accruing to the Government from customs, internal revenue, and miscellaneous sources, together with the repayment of unexpended balances from July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888; and also an estimate of the amount to be derived from the same sources during the months of April, May, and June, 1888.

	Customs.	Internal revenue.	Miscellaneous.	Total.
From July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888...	$168,159,447.18	$91,513,967.36	$23,387,264.46	$283,060,699.00
Estimated receipts for April, 1888.....	18,830,601.51	11,248,885.57	2,518,174.05	32,597,661.13
Estimated receipts for May, 1888	18,050,766.47	13,861,639.16	2,866,220.93	34,788,626.56
Estimated receipts for June, 1888	19,519,770.32	10,644,887.88	3,544,966.42	33,709,624.62
Total for twelve months ending June 30, 1888....	224,570,585.48	127,269,390.97	32,316,625.86	384,156,611.31

It will be seen from this statement that between the 1st day of July, 1887, and the 31st day of March, 1888, the total net receipts of the Government amounted to the sum of $283,060,699, and that for the remainder of the fiscal year such receipts are estimated to increase this amount by $101,095,912.31. If the estimated receipts should prove to be correct when the fiscal year ends—that is, on the 30th day of June next—there will have been paid into the Treasury during the preceding twelve months, from all sources, the sum of $384,156,611.31. Against this latter amount are to be charged the expenditures during the same period, as shown by another statement from the Treasury Department, which I also submit to the committee:

Statement showing the expenditures of the Government from July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888; the estimated expenditures for April, May, and June, 1888; the available balance in the Treasury March 31, 1888, and the estimated available balance for June 30, 1888.

Expenditures from July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888..	$244,068,137.00
Estimated expenditure for April, May, and June, 1888	64,931,863.00
Total for twelve months ending June 30, 1888.....	309,000,000.00
Available balance in the Treasury March 31, 1888		$104,573,930.34
Add estimated receipts for—
April	32,597,661.13
May	34,788,626.56
June.....	33,709,624.62
	101,095,912.31
Less estimated expenditure for April, May, and June	64,931,863.00
		36,164,049.31
Estimated available balance June 30, 1888		140,737,979.65

Deducting the expenditures from the receipts, we find that there will have been collected from the people, for public purposes, during the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1888, $75,156,611.31 more than was necessary to meet the demands of the Government. But there was on the 31st day of last month an available balance, a portion of which came over from preceding years, of $104,573,930.34, and, if the estimated receipts for April, May, and June, less the estimated expenditures for the same months be added, we should have in the Treasury on the 30th day of next June an available balance of $140,737,979.65.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the condition of the Treasury. Can any one possessing ordinary capacity fail to understand it?

But it has been asked, and it will continue to be asked, upon whom does the accountability for this vast accumulation of public money properly rest? Which one of the two great political parties that are now striving for the mastery is justly chargeable with the imposition and continuance of a rate of taxation resulting in the withdrawal from the people and from circulation already too much contracted, and without any necessity therefor, so enormous a quantity of the currency of the country?

There is not the slightest difficulty in fixing the responsibility. The proceedings of this House, as they appear of record, supply us with whatever evidence may be necessary, and this record can not be contradicted. It is absolutely true. Four times has the Democratic side of this House, with a small defection from its ranks, attempted to reform and to reduce the present tariff, and as often has the effort failed of successful issue. On two occasions the measures carefully framed and ably presented were contemptuously rejected by the Republican side, aided by a very small minority of the Democrats; and on the other occasions the bills were even denied a consideration.

It was within the power of the opponents of those measures to have amended them to their own liking, but this they would not do. The present tariff law, with all of its gross and palpable inequalities, with all of its criminal partiality for particular interests, and with its utter disregard for the general welfare of the country, and with the recognized certainty of its creating a large and highly-dangerous surplus in the Treasury, thereby engendering corruption, extravagance, and bad legislation of every kind, suited them best.

They did not want nor would they have any change whatever in the existing law. Its operation, however oppressive upon the agricultural and laboring classes, was accomplishing the result which they most desired, a surplus to be uselessly and extravagantly expended.

The appeal is now made to them for the fifth time. Will it be disregarded as heretofore? Let them beware.

Every demand of the tariff reformers has been, indeed, moderate. The language used is rather that of entreaty than of exaction. If this Congress should altogether refuse to give the people relief from the taxation which is now pressing upon them so heavily and so unequally, the sixth presentation of a reform bill may be in a manner quite different from the present, and the bill then presented may involve a total and a radical change in the system now in force, and may be supported by a majority so overwhelming as to render a compromise wholly unnecessary.

Again, I say, let the opponents of reform beware. The whirlwind and the storm are not easily stayed. Destruction and devastation too often follow in their path. The popular mind is in a state of unrest. The pernicious effects of an unjust, a partial, and a burdensome tariff are being seen and felt everywhere. It will be, indeed, well for those who have been so long and so enormously profiting from such legislation not to further provoke the suffering classes by resisting the moderate demands of this hour. The ballot is yet powerful to enforce the right and to redress the wrong, and through the ballot a change will come in the political complexion of the Congress, and with it measures which will remove from the statute-book every trace of class legislation and of individual advantage heretofore obtained through Congressional favoritism.

But the surplus is with us, and what are we to do with it? In answer to this question I unhesitatingly say that the policy should be to apply the present and all future balances, as fast as they may accrue and without one moment's waste of time, to the payment of the bonded debt; and to this policy I would have the legislative and executive departments of the Government inflexibly adhere until the last bond be discharged and the last mortgage raised from the industries of the country. This was the policy of the fathers. It has been the great objective point of every administration prior to the civil war, whenever there existed a national debt, however small. The policy has worked well in the past. It will work equally well now.

Freedom from debt means a vast deal more than the relief of the people from the burden of its payment, great as that burden is. It will involve a policy as to the currency quite different from that which now obtains, relieving the country from the domination of Wall street and giving to individual energy, industry, and enterprise its free and natural play, without the meddlesome hindrance of governmental interference.

The policy of the protectionists, however, if we may judge from what is transpiring in Congress, is quite different. These gentlemen as a rule, to which there are here and there a few exceptions, favor large appropriations. They delight to inaugurate grand schemes; they believe in a philanthropic government; there is nothing little about them; they love to declaim upon the greatness of the Government, its strength and its power. Rigid economy is not one of their faults.

Very many of them are anxious to see the General Government more centralized than now, and in the construction of the Constitution they are extremely liberal. They would have the greatness of the Union manifested in stone and in marble upon every hill and mountain top and along every valley and stream throughout the country, forgetting that the greatest strength of any government is in the love and confidence of the people, and that its greatest wealth is in the prosperity and happiness of the individual citizen, without regard to his station in social life.

Mr. Chairman, it will be interesting to inquire as to how this vast surplus has gotten into the Treasury and from what sources it has been drawn.

We are told that of the $384,156,611.31 which is to be collected during this fiscal year, $224,570,585.48 comes as customs, $127,269,399.97 as internal revenue, and $32,316,625.86 as miscellaneous. In a word, it is derived almost entirely from taxation in various forms and imposed in different modes, and it is this taxation which is to be, in a great measure, affected by the pending bill.

There can be, to my mind, no question as to which is the wiser policy; whether the present rate of taxation shall be maintained and the surplus, over and above ordinary and current expenditures, be applied to enterprises requiring heavy and long-continued appropriations, or whether the rate of taxation shall be so reduced as to prevent, if possible, any further accumulation of money in the Treasury beyond what may be required to meet the wants of the Government, honestly and economically administered.

The latter proposition needs but to be stated. Its entire correctness will be unhesitatingly accepted by every one not irrevocably committed to the protective policy, its folly and its wickedness. But let us examine for a short time, Mr. Chairman, some of the most striking features of the present law regulating the duties on imports.

An extensive acquaintance with the science of economics is not necessary to a clear comprehension of the vices which are not only inherent, but which are also apparent throughout the entire law, from the beginning to the end. Scarcely a single provision is exempt from just criticism. It is wholly unclean. Everywhere in it can be readily seen clear and palpable violations of those great and fundamental principles which should underlie and support measures of this kind.

The rank injustice of very many of its requirements is its chief characteristic.

Its gross partiality toward certain classes is so marked as to be readily detected by the most superficial observer.

But, sir, let us first read the law in the light of a debate which occurred in this House on the 10th day of June, 1868. The subject of taxation was under discussion, during which the great principle which should be always observed by the Government in the imposition of taxes was clearly stated and distinctly announced.

This debate is also important because of the distinguished characters who were engaged in it.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I desire to discuss, briefly, the amendment which the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means so vigorously opposes. And in the first place let me say that during the entire war, when we were seeking everything on earth, and in the skies, and in the waters under the earth, out of which taxation could be wrung, it never entered into the conception of Congress to tax breadstuffs—never.

During the most pressing exigencies of the terrible contest in which we were engaged, neither breadstuffs nor lumber ever became the subject of one penny of taxation. What was the reason of this? Let me tell my friend from Ohio that it was not because of the influence of the rich grain-dealers at Chicago, or Toledo, or Milwaukee. It was because if anything be universal breadstuffs are universal, for they constitute literally "the staff of life."

If you impose on them a tax ever so small in amount it will be made a pretext by the very speculators of whom gentlemen talk for adding an appreciable amount to the cost of a barrel of flour. I do beseech this House not to sanction the principle of subjecting such an article to taxation for the sake of the paltry amount that is to be gained from this source.

Mr. WELKER. Does the gentleman expect to secure an exemption from lumber by advocating an exemption from breadstuffs?

Mr. BLAINE. I am refering to breadstuffs because it illustrates a principle. I beseech this House not to sanction a tax on breadstuffs which simply build up a mountain of prejudice for the sake of a mole-hill of revenue.

But, sir, I have said enough on that point. Now, as to the article of lumber, I again remind the House that there never has been a tax on this article. The gentleman from Ohio may talk of this question as he pleases; but I say that whenever the western frontiersman undertakes to make for himself a home, to till the soil, to carry on the business of life, he needs lumber for his cabin; he needs lumber for his fence; he needs lumber for his wagon or cart; he needs lumber for his plow; he needs lumber for almost every purpose in his daily life.

Mr. PAINE. Does he not need clothing also?

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Maine did not answer the last question put to him. He passed it by, because to be consistent with what he had just previously said in reference to breadstuffs and to lumber, he must have answered it in the affirmative; and to have so answered it would have been a most severe rebuke to the action of his party in imposing heavy duties upon other articles of equally as universal use and of as great necessity to the people.

Leader as he was and now is, ambitious as he was for political advancement, committed as he had long been to the protective policy of the party of which he had been a so very prominent and influential member, he could not permit the just and reasonable application of the principle—universal use—to clothing and to other articles equally as necessary and as generally used as lumber.

Sir, this debate, short as it is, and arising upon the proposition to impose a tax upon manufacturers, is pregnant with meaning. In it the great Republican leader, though a sincere and an earnest protectionist, has enunciated the very principle upon which the advocates of tariff reform and reduction rest their case, which is, in brief, that no burden should be imposed by the Government, even for revenue purposes only, upon such articles as are of prime necessity and in general use.

It is scarcely necessary, I trust, to ask the question if salt, cooking utensils, table and household furniture, implements of husbandry, clothing, and many other articles now subjected to an enormous tax, be not in as general use and of as great necessity as lumber, of which the gentleman from Maine spoke so feelingly and so eloquently?

And would not a tax, however small, and though in the form of a duty on imports upon such articles as I have mentioned, as surely lead to speculation, with all of its dangerous and attendant evils, as would a tax upon the manufacturer of flour?

And if such articles were delivered from taxation, direct and indirect, would not the consumer be able to realize a greater net revenue from his employment, whatever that may be, than if the tax were continued on them?

These questions must be answered in the affirmative. They can not be truthfully answered in any other way.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us see how this law, of which all true and genuine revenue reformers so bitterly complain, is framed in reference to those articles which are in general use and which are considered necessary to the comfort and well-being of the vast majority of the people; and when it is considered that the revenue arising from the duty on these articles constitutes by far the largest portion of the receipts from customs, we can not but be amazed that any such tax could have proceeded from the representatives of a people, freely chosen by them.

I ask to be permitted to read to the committee the following statement, which I have obtained from the Bureau of Statistics:

Statement showing the average ad valorem rate of duty on the following articles for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, under tariff act of March 3, 1883.

*Average.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not true that when that bill was in the Forty-seventh Congress it was with great difficulty that the Democratic party got the duty on cotton-ties down to 35 per cent.?

Mr. SAYERS. I think so, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. And is it not true that ten votes were taken in this House in efforts made by the advocates of the bill, the opponents of the Democratic party, to make that tax 100 per cent.?

Mr. SAYERS. I think so. That is my recollection.

Mr. WHEELER. That is a fact.

Mr. SAYERS. Applying the principle of universal use and of unquestioned necessity, as enunciated by Mr. Blaine in the debate which I have already quoted, is it possible to excuse or to defend the imposition of such a tax as is imposed upon the articles specified in this list? We see that these articles are not only taxed, but they are heavily taxed, the producers of these articles being favored to that extent. For them the market of the United States is almost exclusively reserved.

Is it a wonder, then, that the manufacturers of this country with this extraordinary advantage have grown wealthy and strong? For almost an hundred years they have been thus aided by the Government at the expense of every other industry known to the people. The farmer, however, must go abroad with his products handicapped not only with such cost of production as he would naturally incur, but also with the weight of an exorbitant and an unnecessary taxation upon everything that he must have for his maintenance, and thus loaded to the very guards he enters the markets of the world and encounters the severest competition. Purchasers are generally there, it is true, but they are there only to buy at their own figures. And so it is with the laborer in the workshop, in the field, in the household, on the railway, in the mine, everywhere and in every vocation. He, too, must brace himself up against all comers and must prepare himself to do them successful battle. He must take the wages tendered him by the employer or remain idle, subjecting himself to the fearful penalty which enforced non-employment almost always imposes upon the unfortunate one. [Applause.]

The Government says to the foreign manufacturer, "You may bring your merchandise here and the American people may buy of you, but only upon the condition that you pay a tax so devised that for every dollar accruing from it to the Government $4 shall go into the pockets of the manufacturer."

But where do the farmer and the agricultural laborer come in? What provision is made by the Government for them? Can any one tell me? Mr. Chairman, in order to see how irrationally and unjustly thissystem works, let us look at the condition of the unprotected classes and see what they are doing for the country. Consider our exports, through which foreign wealth is brought and distributed among us. In the absence of specific information one would naturally suppose that inasmuch as our manufacturers have been so long and so munificently provided for by the Government, they would contribute most liberally to swell the volume of our foreign trade, and that to them we would be most indebted for the acquisition of the foreign wealth which comes annually through commerce to our shores. This would be the reasonable supposition. But is it so? The answer is furnished in a statement by the Bureau of Statistics, which I beg leave to submit to the committee:

Value of the following products of domestic agriculture exported from the United States to foreign countries during the year ending June 30, 1887.

Cotton and manufactures of:
Unmanufactured	$206,222,057
Manufactures of	14,929,342
		$221,151,399
Corn	19,317,361
Corn-meal	705,343
		20,052,704
Wheat	90,716,481
Wheat flour	51,950,082
Other breadstuffs	1,332,362
		143,998,925
Rye	216,190
Rye flour	11,781
		227,971
Oats	179,634
Oat-meal	456,023
		635,657
Barley		853,405
Cattle		9,172,136
Beef products		15,517,882
Pork products		61,659,918
Vegetables		1,308,653
Total value of articles above mentioned			$474,578,650
Total exports		716,183,211
Less foreign exports		13,160,288
Total value of exports of domestic merchandise			703,022,923

These and other products not enumerated in this statement come from more than 4,000,000 of farms, large and small, and these farms cover an area of more than 3,000,000 of acres whose estimated annual yield reaches the enormous sum of $2,500,000,000.

This vast accumulation of wealth, which goes to feed and to clothe the people not only of this but of other countries, derives no benefit whatever from a protective tariff. On the contrary, those from whose toil, energy, frugality, and self-denial this vast proportion of the world's yearly supply comes are made to endure without compensation the burdens which our present system of taxation imposes, and if we take into account the taxes paid by them for the maintenance of the State and county governments, we can not but reach the conclusion that the farmers and agricultural laborers of these United States have always been and now are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for those industries whose wealth and whose power are in the main due to the unjust partiality of a government which should be administered for the benefit of all and not for the enhancement of any individual.

But, Mr. Chairman, I call the especial attention of the committee to the proportion which the value of the few articles in this list bears to the value of all our exports.

Here you find that cotton and wheat alone, out of a sum-total of $703,022,923, supply $296,938,538. I will say nothing of the amount used in home consumption, but confine myself to that portion which must seek and does seek a foreign market, at whose hands no kindness can be expected. They enjoy no favors from their own government, and they therefore do not expect better treatment from the alien and the stranger.

If I am not misinformed, there is a rebate allowed exporters of fish and canned meats to the extent of the duty on the salt used in such exportations. Why this gratuity upon the part of the Government to these individuals? It can not be properly called anything else than a gratuity—a mere gift without any consideration except, perhaps, that of love and affection.

The reason is, I am told, in order that such exports may leave our shores burdened with as little cost as possible, thereby being the better able to successfully compete with like productions in the markets of the world.

But why not treat the exportation of cotton, corn, wheat, rye, oats, and barley in the same liberal manner? Why not allow to the producers of these great and staple articles, which contribute so much to enlarge our foreign commerce, rebates to the extent of the duties upon what they must necessarily use in growing them and in preparing them for market? The Government should not be allowed the privilege of a parent or the partiality of a friend. The Constitution, upon which it must depend for its vitality, does not clothe it with such attributes.

To assume them is an unjustifiable usurpation of power, the grossest violation of the plainest rules of justice, an act of tyranny which merits the severest condemnation.

Truly may it be said that the protected industries have been the petted and the spoiled favorites of the Government for near one hundred years, and as such they have become insolent, unscrupulous, and imperious.

Every other avocation, in war and in peace, in prosperity and in adversity, has been compelled to contribute to their support. From them, during all this time, the men and women of this country have been compelled to buy at enhanced prices and an enormous disadvantage. More than twelve billions of dutiable merchandise have been imported since 1789, all of which has been burdened with taxation for the home producer of such articles, so imposed that four-fifths of the result of such taxation has accrued to his benefit while only one-fifth has gone into the Federal Treasury.

So long has this favoritism been enjoyed by him—having been handed down from sire to son and from generation to generation—that he now looks upon it as a vested right, and he regards any withdrawal of any portion, however small, of governmental support as the deprivation of a most righteous inheritance.

What was first asked as a mere bounty in order to sustain his infancy is now regarded as a matter of strict ownership; and though he has grown to manhood's estate and possesses more than manhood's strength, he is as clamorous to-day for assistance as when he could number the years of his existence upon the fingers of his hands. Ay, more so. For the ten years succeeding the first day of October, 1790, he was content to enjoy the advantage of an average duty of 15.46 per cent.; to-day he insists that a tax on imported merchandise amounting to 45.57 per cent. is not enough to maintain himself against European capital, labor, skill, and enterprise. He declares himself weaker in 1888 than he was in 1790. He would be better protected.

Let us briefly contrast, Mr. Chairman, the condition of this country during the first decade of its constitutional existence with the appearance which it now presents. Then we comprised but thirteen States, thinly populated and just emerging from a long-continued and devastating war, carried on within their borders; now we number thirty-eight States and eight Territories, not including Alaska and some of the lands occupied by the Indian tribes; then we could count but little more than 4,000,000 of people, now our population reaches 60,000,000; then our manufactories were few, rude, and poor; now they are almost without number, of every variety, splendidly equipped, and rich with the acquisition of a century of labor and of special care and protection; then our political existence was but precarious, and we enjoyed the friendship—and that not altogether steadfast and unselfish—of but one people in the whole world; now we are the mightiest of the nations, and the proudest and the strongest and the oldest of them all would hesitate long and much to give serious provocation. For the ten years ending in 1800 our imports, including bullion, amounted to but $589,846,454 in value, and our exports during the same length of time to but $188,344,293; while for the one year ending June 30, 1887, the value of our imports was $692,319,768, and the value of exported domestic productions was $703,022,923. What a marvelous development!

The contrast, Mr. Chairman, which I have attempted to briefly draw is as true as it is striking; but no less true and no less striking is the contrast between the duties levied on imports of 1790–1800 and that of 1888.

During the former years the average rate of this character of taxation was but 15.46 per cent.; to-day it exceeds 45 per cent. and falls heaviest upon the necessaries of life.

Is this increase justifiable? Can it be excused? Are the circumstances which surround the protected industries of such a character as to demand the imposition of such an enormous burden upon the consumers of the country?

Who but him that is numbered among the favored classes will rise to palliate or to defend such legislative and executive iniquity as has conceived and consummated such a system of import duties? But, sir, I desire to invite the attention of the committee to another utterance of Mr. Blaine in the debate which I have quoted. It is indeed suggested, and in view of what is transpiring in the commercial and manufacturing departments of American life and activity, possesses the truth and wisdom of an axiom.

Says the distinguished gentleman, if you impose on them a tax ever so small in amount, it will be made a pretext by the very speculators of whom gentlemen talk for adding an appreciable amount to the cost of a barrel of flour.

Mark you, the proposition was to tax the manfacturer, not the article itself, which was then under discussion.

If this be true as to flour, if it be true as to lumber, is it not equally true as to any other commodity necessary to the comfort, to the well-being, and to the happiness of life? And does it matter whether such tax be direct or indirect, on net incomes or on gross receipts? And is not this tax added to the selling price of the article as it passes along the channels of trade and commerce, until it reaches the last purchaser or consumer, upon whom it finally falls?

But the protectionist says that his policy will increase the quantity of the favored article, and that competition will, as with the produce of the farmer and the wages of the laborer, cause a decline in the price, resulting in a benefit to the consumer.

Is this so? Does our own experience sustain and justify the assertion? It will not be necessary to search the economic literature of the past and the present in which to find a satisfactory answer. The press of to-day is full to the overflowing with facts drawn from every quarter, which establish, beyond dispute, the falsity of the proposition.

Competition, I most cheerfully acknowledge, is under certain circumstances a most powerful agency, through which exorbitancy in charges may be successfully combatted and completely overthrown. But an instrumentality more potent than competition—stronger than the law of supply and demand—has made its appearance in the commercial and the manufacturing world, and now has the consumers of this country by the very throat.

The instrumentality of which I speak is combination, whose presence in any field of enterprise or industry is proof conclusive that the humane, the health-giving, the exhilarating law of competition is a dead letter upon the statute-book of human action. It may, therefore, be said—with all the certainty of truth—that when combination is possible, competition is impossible.

Within the past few years this mighty agency for evil has developed into such potency as to obtain the almost entire control of the commerce of these United States.

Combinations have been consummated, gathering—so to speak—into one fold and under a common management every individual, company, and corporation which may be engaged in any particular industry and crushing out whomsoever should refuse to enter the trust.

When the trust is completed everything relating to the industry around which it has coiled its deadly strength—whether it be as to the employment and management of labor, or whether it be as to the price and the amount of the product and the time when it shall be put upon the market—is subject to one control, in whom every power necessary to the full execution of the trust is fully vested.

These organizations are forming all over the country and are laying their unholy hands upon those products whose cheapness and abundance are absolutely essential to the popular welfare.

The law as it is, or rather as it is announced and enforced, is powerless before them. Legislatures and the Congress have no terrors for them.

As matters of curiosity, Mr. Chairman, I have been for some time past gathering up the names and purposes of these trusts and names of those who compose them, as I have found them in the public prints, and to illustrate their character I beg leave to submit four of them to the committee:

These are but so many, Mr. Chairman, of the almost numberless organizations of the kind which have been formed and are continuing to be formed all over the United States. It will be noticed that they have taken hold of the protected industries, and they are the means invented and used by speculators to make successful their nefarious operations.

Is there and can there be any hope for the freedom of commerce so long as these combinations are permissible?

They are the legitimate and the natural outgrowth of class legislation. They are the fruitage of governmental protection to special interests. Any one with sense sufficient to keep himself out of the fire ought to be able to see that, in the presence of the probabilities—I will not say the possibilities—to result from this kind of organized capital and power, free institutions will be in the greatest danger. But what is the remedy, Mr. Chairman? Reduce taxation to a strictly revenue basis, and let there be no partiality shown in the manner of its imposition. Supplement such a revenue law with the courageous use and application of the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce. Apply every dollar of the surplus money in the Treasury and whenever it accrues to the payment of the bonded debt. Supply the vacuum created by the withdrawal of national-bank notes from circulation with gold and silver coin and with paper money issued directly by the Government and not through individual or corporate agencies.

By so doing, you will make it the more difficult for speculators to combine, and you will give to commerce that freedom of action in which the principle of competition will display a living, energetic force, and the law of supply and demand will again assert itself in the economic conditions of the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, the struggle which is now going on is but the repetition of other bitter and prolonged contests which have transpired in this House whenever it has been sought to reform and to reduce the tariff.

On the one side are arrayed the protected interests, each one supporting the others and summoning to their aid every influence of whatever kind that can be made available. From every quarter of the Union—North and South, East and West—corporate power is exerting itself most strenuously for the maintenance of a high rate of taxation. The wildest and most extravagant schemes are being proposed and advocated for the purpose of depleting the Treasury.

On the other side stand the representatives of the unprotected classes, the consumers of the country, men, women, and children who are most vitally interested in having cheap bread, cheap clothing, cheap lumber, cheap household utensils and furniture, and cheap implements of husbandry.

In these latter classes are included the millions of wage-workers, with their dependent families; the farmers, who till the soil and make it bring forth the abundant harvest which not only supplies sixty millions of people with sustenance, but also furnishes the greater part by far of our exports, by which wealth is withdrawn from foreign lands in order to bring comfort and independence and happiness to our own; and all others, except the few upon whom the Government has been so long and so generously lavishing its favors.

Again and again and again have our ablest and most trusted leaders in language strong and emphatic denounced all legislation the effect of which would be to enrich the few at the expense of the many; but perhaps no one has spoken so earnestly and so forcibly as did General Jackson when retiring from the Presidency.

Standing as he did before the people, full of years and of honors, civic and military, about to forever retire from the duties of public life, grateful for the confidence and affection which he had so long enjoyed and which he deserved so well, the retiring President declared that the tax imposed on goods enhanced by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imposts is drawn from their pockets; that Congress has no right under the Constitution to take money from the people unless it is required to execute some one of the specific powers intrusted to the Government; that if more than is necessary for such purposes be raised, it is an abuse of the power of taxation and unjust and oppressive; that many powerful interests are continually at work to procure heavy duties on commerce and to swell the revenue beyond the real necessities of the public service; that a tariff of duties which bore most oppressively on the agricultural and laboring classes had been procured, producing more revenue than could be constitutionally used; and that to fasten upon the people this unjust and unequal system of taxation extravagant schemes were gotten up to squander the money; that corporations and wealthy individuals, who are engaged in large manufacturing establishments, desire a high tariff to increase their gains; that such a system is unjust, and if persisted in will inevitably lead to corruption and to ruin. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, so it was in 1837; it is equally so to-day. The present condition of the Treasury; the character of the present tariff law; the many and powerful influences brought to bear against its repeal; the extravagant schemes now pending in Congress, as indicated by the bills introduced and pushed forward, make the situation of to-day an exact repetition of the condition of the country more than fifty years ago, as given to us by General Jackson, save only that the sum accumulating is much larger, the duties imposed much more burdensome upon the agricultural and laboring classes, the corporate and individual influences against their reform and reduction more numerous and far more powerful, and the plans for the plunder of the Treasury much bolder and more comprehensive. If the evils of an unjust, unequal, and unnecessary system of taxation were so great and so threatening as to call for the solemn and urgent warning of this warrior statesman in his last utterance to the people how much greater and more serious are the same evils as they now exist?

It is true that in certain quarters and among certain classes prosperity does abide.

It is true that wealth is being accumulated more speedily and in larger quantities than ever before; but these enormous accumulations are confined to a few, a very few, as compared with our entire population. But wealth so acquired indicates most clearly an unnatural and a diseased condition of things. Those great natural laws, which give to thrift, energy, industry, and economy a sure reward, will not, if properly and fully enforced, permit the acquisition of so much wealth and in so short a time in a country like the one in which we live and under a government which, theoretically at least, rests upon the equality of all citizens before the law.

The times are ominous. Troubles, affecting the peace and quiet of this great commonwealth of States, are continually arising, and they will continue to arise so long as class legislation disgraces our statute-books and corporate power brooks no restraint. These troubles are warnings to us. We will be wise if we heed them, and heeding them act as the gravity of the situation demands, promptly and effectively, beginning with the tariff and following up the work closely, industriously, and courageously, until good, honest, and impartial government is restored to the people of this country. The pending measure is, I confess, not all that is to be desired. When the proper time comes, under the rules of this House, it can be, and will doubtless be, amended so as to make it more consistent with the principles of justice and of equality. As for myself I know of but one course to pursue, and that course I have already indicated. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I trust that the committee will pardon me for referring to an incident which occurred within my observation about four years ago. I have spoken of it elsewhere and before different audiences, but it will not be amiss on this occasion. While engaged in canvassing the district which I have the honor to represent, late in the afternoon of a long and sultry summer day, when going from one county site to another, I passed by a field of a few acres. In that field I saw a very aged female supporting herself with a crutch, and by her side was a little child small enough to be in its mother's arms. These two people—so widely apart in years, yet so near to each other in helplessness—were engaged in gathering cotton, the product of months of toil, self-denial, and anxiety. It was then upon the stalk, the fruit of a year's labor. As I saw them thus employed and thought of the adverse circumstances by which they were surrounded, I could not refrain thinking of the burdens which were upon them and how much it would require of the cotton they were picking to purchase the merest and most ordinary necessaries of life. I thought of the taxation which this great and rich and powerful Government was mercilessly and cruelly imposing upon them and upon all others similarly situated in life.

I thought of the increased cost to them, by reason of the cruelty and mercilessness of the Government, of the clothing which they wore, of the household utensils and farming implements which they were compelled to buy and to use, of the very salt that was required for their food in order to make it palatable and to give health and strength to their bodies, of the bagging which was to cover and to protect the cotton which they were gathering with so much difficulty, and of the ties which were to bind it together.

I then and there pledged myself to myself, as I have often times since done to the people in the most public manner, that, whether in Congress or out of Congress, I would never cease to labor for the entire removal of the burdens which are now resting upon the agricultural classes of this country, and I am here to-day, Mr. Chairman, to redeem that pledge so far as within my power. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, by unanimous consent, the time was extended until the conclusion of Mr. SAYERS's remarks.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. McMILLIN) having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues, and had come to no resolution thereon.

"And also to inform the House what sums of money have been expended by the Government to prevent the unlawful killing and extermination of fur seals and fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and for the enforcement of the laws in relation thereto; and what sums have been received by the Government on account of any leases of the right to take fur seals and fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and on account of any and all other Government charges for the taking and shipping of such furs from Alaska.

PRINTING EULOGIES ON HON. SETH C. MOFFATT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. That committee has directed me to report back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 148) to print 12,500 copies on the eulogies of Seth C. Moffatt, late a Representative in Congress.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Seth C. Moffatt, a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the State of Michigan, 12,500 copies, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Seth C. Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit another privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution of the House, that the Public Printer be directed to withhold from sale and turn over to the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives 437 copies of the document known as "Fish and Fisheries," the same to be used in making good to the respective members of Congress entitled thereto under the joint resolution passed July 21, 1882, the deficiency occurring to them by reason of the mistake made in the prorating and distribution of such documents under said resolution, have considered the same and recommend that the resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that this is not privileged under the rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rather think it is privileged; it relates to the distribution of certain public documents.

The SPEAKER. But the rule making reports from the Committee on Printing privileged does not provide that such matters as relate to the distribution of books or documents shall be also privileged. The reference is to printing for the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there be any question about it, I hope at all events that the present consideration of the report will not be objected to, as it will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply made the statement lest it might become a question hereafter.

Without objection, the report will be considered at this time.

There was no objection.

The report was adopted and the concurrent resolution agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VISITORS TO MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER designated the following members of the House to attend the next examination of cadets at the United States Military Academy, to wit: Mr. R. W. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois; Mr. HENRY BACON, of New York; Mr. GEORGE W. STEELE, of Indiana.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now demand the regular order, and pending that I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees for reports, and that members having reports to make may be privileged to hand them to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman refer to reports of a public or a private nature?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no desire to limit them to private bills to-day, and will include both in the request.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman to dispense with the call of committees will require a two-thirds vote; but the gentleman asks unanimous consent that members having reports to make may hand them to the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion to dispense with the call of committees for reports was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANHAM. Was it contemplated by the resolution adopted on Wednesday last, setting apart certain days for general discussion of the tariff bill, that it should include Fridays during the time stated in the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what the gentleman who framed the resolution contemplated in respect to that matter. The resolution itself does not specify. It simply provides that there shall be seventeen days allowed for general debate, after the day on which the resolution was presented; but it does not provide that these shall be the seventeen days in consecutive order thereafter, and therefore all the other rules of the House are in force. According to the resolution adopted it may be that only one day in a week would be occupied in the discussion until the seventeen days were consumed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the resolution be reported again.

Mr. LANHAM. There is one clause in the resolution which provides—

No change to be made in the present rule as to sessions on Friday night.

It does not make any provision for the day sessions.

Mr. REED. That provision to which the gentleman alludes was simply incorporated to make an exception of pension nights.

The SPEAKER. And in order that there should be no doubt on that point.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no doubt that it is the desire of the House to go on with the tariff discussion to-day. If, therefore, the gentleman from Texas shall move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the House shall vote that motion down, I give notice that I will immediately move to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has asked that the resolution adopted be again reported. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays the Committee of the Whole shall rise at 5.30 p. m. and the House shall take a recess until 8 p. m., the evening sessions to be for debate only. On Mondays and Saturdays the sessions shall end at 5.30 p. m. No change to be made in the present rule as to sessions on Friday night. General debate on the tariff bill shall continue seventeen days after to-day, excluding Sundays, and also any interruptions ordered by the House; a general leave to print to be given.

Mr. LANHAM. As I understand the purport of that resolution, it seems to have been the design that Friday, in the day sessions, should also be devoted to the general debate upon the tariff bill; and believing as I do, that the consideration of that bill is a subject of supreme importance, and that private business ought to yield to its consideration, I will not make any motion to-day that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman of course can determine for himself what motion he will make. The Chair still thinks, however, that the order does not interfere with the consideration of private bills to-day, or other special orders, if the House shall see proper to proceed with them.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I demand the regular order.

Mr. REED. The regular order, then, is private bills, is it not?

The SPEAKER. This question is one which the Chair has examined with some care, because certain Mondays are set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and there may be other days, the Chair thinks, heretofore set apart by order of the House for the consideration of other business, and the question has more significance, therefore, than would attach to it merely on account of this being the day set apart for the consideration of private business, and the Chair was anxious to come to a correct conclusion in reference to it.

The Chair thinks that under the rules of the House this day is set apart for the consideration of private business, and if the motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and it is not agreed to by the House, then public business will proceed as on other days. But the Chair thinks that under the rule of the House, when the regular order is demanded, it is the duty of the Chair to announce that, this being Friday, the consideration of bills of a private nature is first in order.

Mr. LANHAM. As I understand it to be the interpretation of the Committee on Ways and Means that it was intended to-day should be devoted to general debate on the tariff bill, and, as I have stated, I believe that subject is of importance far greater than private business, so far as I am concerned I decline to make the motion that the House go into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there is private business upon the House Calendar, that, under the demand for the regular order, would be the business the consideration of which the House would now proceed with.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In the absence of any motion respecting private business I will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the tariff bill. But if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] desires to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar, I will withhold my motion, giving notice that if the other motion is defeated I will then renew it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I am informed by gentlemen around me that there was an understanding by the Committee on Ways and Means on both sides that the tariff debate was to continue without interruption. While I think the work done by committees of this House in the consideration and reporting of claims has been of a character that demands recognition at the hands of the House on the few days given for the consideration of that class of business, yet I am not disposed to violate any agreement made by the Committee on Ways and Means, and I shall not therefore insist on a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. REED. I want it to be distinctly understood that there has been no agreement except what is expressed in the written statement which has been read to the House. I think there should be no misunderstanding in regard to that at all. It is understood that the House has the power over its own action, subject only to the understanding which is expressed in the written document which was read to and adopted by the House. That is understood on both sides.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Perhaps I was wrong in saying it was an understanding by the Committee on Ways and Means. But I am reliably informed by various gentlemen that they know there was an understanding that the debate on the tariff should proceed.

The SPEAKER. In what the Chair stated he simply desired to put the correct interpretation upon the order, because, as has been already said, the question may arise again as to the days which have been set apart by the House for the consideration of other business. If there is no private business unfinished on the Calendar the Chair will entertain the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. [After a pause.] The Chair is informed there is an unfinished report from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LANHAM. I am not aware that any recommendation had been made by the Committee of the Whole House in regard to the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole reported the bill back. That, of course, takes it out of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of that bill shall go over until it is reached again in the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4257) for the relief of Hannah J. Jones, executrix.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to know why it is sought to pass that bill over.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that there seems to have been some conflict over this bill in the Committee of the Whole, and it does not appear to be desired to have it considered at this time. But I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that for myself I have no desire either to defeat or delay that bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors whether, if the House should not decide to take up the tariff bill, he proposes that the House shall go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the river and harbor bill?

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of order. In the prevailing confusion it is utterly impossible to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats and the House will come to order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think the House desires to know what is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to have the river and harbor bill considered by the House whenever he can get it up; but there is no conflict between the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee on Ways and Means at this time.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the House should vote down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the tariff bill, then will the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the river and harbor bill be made?

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER. Is it in order for any member to move that we now go into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WARNER. Is that the first motion in order?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, this being Friday.

Mr. WARNER. Without wishing to antagonize any other business, but feeling these private measures should have consideration, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If that motion is voted down, I will then move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the tariff bill.

The question being taken on Mr. WARNER'S motion, there were—ayes 58, noes 69.

Mr. BRUMM. Before the Speaker announces the result of the vote I wish to ask whether this does not require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. It requires a majority to carry the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

So (further count not being called for) the motion of Mr. WARNER was not agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the House should vote down that motion would it then be in order for any member to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the river and harbor bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion would not be order in that form; but it would be in order for any member to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills, and if that motion should prevail then the river and harbor bill would come up in its order.

The motion of Mr. MCMILLIN was agreed to.

TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the revenue.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, the issue which this measure presents to the country and to this House is one which I gladly welcome. From 1865 to 1875 the question of reconstruction and other questions of great importance naturally arising from the war occupied the attention of the public mind. Then followed questions of finance, and for the last ten years the tariff question has forced itself upon the public mind. Since the organization of the Republican party the great mass of its members have favored the policy of protection to American industry and American labor, while the Democratic party has at all times until recently sought to evade the direct question in all its public utterances and platforms by the use of language susceptible of various constructions, in order to meet the views of the members of its party in the different parts of the country. In 1868 that party declared in its platform for "incidental protection;" in 1872 it nominated a high protective tariff Republican and left the question of protection to each Congressional district to decide as it saw fit; in 1876 it declared for a tariff "only for revenue," while in 1880 it reversed the language and declared for a "tariff for revenue only," and in 1884 it declared for protection, for free trade, for "incidental protection," for a "tariff only for revenue," and a tariff for "revenue only," so that each voter could read and construe the platform to suit his own convictions. In Kentucky, Indiana, and Michigan it meant free trade, while in Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was able to make them believe it meant protection. By reason of fraud upon the ballot-box, and intimidation of voters in one portion of the country and base deception practiced by the leaders of the Democratic party in another portion, that party succeeded in electing its candidate for President and took control of the Government. For three years the executive department of the Government as well as this House has played "fast and loose" upon this great question until the necessities of the Government have compelled the Administration to take some position upon the tariff question, and I honor the President for having compelled his party to stop its double dealing and to define its position by its work here in the House. The President in his recent message to Congress has given the country his views touching the manner of reducing the revenues of the Government. If he had been as much interested in paying off the public debt with the surplus revenues of the Government as he has been in furthering the interest of his party, the large amount of money now in the Treasury unappropriated would be in the hands of the people and be used in furthering their industrial pursuits. Congress had long since authorized him to purchase unmatured bonds with the surplus revenue, and he did purchase over $27,000,000 worth of such bonds, when he at once stopped, and has continued to hoard up the excessive revenues in the Treasury Department of the Government, leaving the bonded debt, which should have been paid, to draw interest, and deprived the people of sufficient money to carry on their legitimate business.

It has often been charged, and we think the circumstances are such as to sustain the charge, that this course has been taken by the Administration in order to further the free-trade views which have been so boldly announced by the President. There is no division or sentiment upon the question of reducing the revenues of the Government, but the great question which divides the two political parties is as to the manner of making such reduction. The Democratic policy as declared by the President is to wipe out the duty on wool, iron ore, coal, salt, hemp, and other articles described by him as "raw material," and to largely reduce the duty upon manufactured goods which are imported. In other words, he favors free trade in what are known as "raw materials," and a tariff solely for the purpose of raising revenue upon manufactured goods and other merchandise imported.

There has been no Congressional term since 1866, when the Republican party has been in power in this House, that taxation has not been reduced, and that party to-day is in favor of reducing taxation to such sum as shall only be necessary to meet the principal and interest upon the public debt, pay the pensions provided for our soldiers, and the necessary and proper expenditures of the Government as provided by law; but in making such reductions that party insists upon retaining our American system of protection to American labor and American industry, fully believing that such policy is for the best interest of our people. This policy has met with the approval of the Fathers of the Republic—of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, of Adams and Jackson, and of Webster and Clay—of the men who framed our Constitution, as well as of men who have since stood by and defended it. Whatever language the Democratic party may use in its public utterances, whether it be tariff reform or tariff for revenue only, the spirit and tendency of that party upon that question is one which shall simply raise revenue for the support of the Government without taking into consideration the effect the same may have upon our industries or our labor, and looking towards free trade in as many articles as possible. A tariff simply for raising revenue is one which offers a premium to the foreign producer to the detriment of our own industry and our own labor. It tends to build up and encourage foreign industries and to discourage and depress our own. Whatever may be the effect of a protective tariff in the small and thickly-settled countries of Europe, where their manufacturing industries, as well as their natural resources are fully developed, is immaterial to us. That protective tariff laws in our own country, which is comparatively new, tends to increase the wages of labor and the income of the laborer I think there can be no question. It tends to the building up of new and varied industries, to the employment of labor at higher wages, to the cheapening of the products of our mills and factories, to the opening of a larger and better home market for our farmers, and to the general development of our natural resources.

It is a maxim that can not be overthrown, that the price of our productions is regulated by the demand and supply. Every farmer knows that if our crop of wheat, corn, and potatoes is generally large throughout the country that the price will be low, but if such crops are generally light that the price will be higher. We all understand that if there is but little demand for labor throughout the country that wages must be low, but when we are building many miles of railroad, and making other large public improvements, when all our shops, furnaces, and factories are busy, then labor finds employment at fair and remunerative wages. This being so, we insist that any legislation which tends to build up or increase the demand for labor must necessarily increase the wages of the laborer. The more of the production of foreign labor we import to supply the wants of our people, so much the less shall we manufacture or produce in our own country, and our labor has to that extent been deprived of employment. Every farmer knows that the more wool we import from South America or Australia, and the more potatoes we import from Canada, so much less wool and potatoes shall we need to produce in our own country to supply the wants of our people, and he fully understands that by reason of such importations he has been deprived of his just and proper income. These are simple propositions, and readily understood by all. The farmer can not live at his chosen occupation unless there is a demand for that which he grows, and the laborer can not find employment unless there is a demand for that which he produces.

If the wants of our people are to be supplied by the production of foreign labor then our shops, our furnaces, and our factories must remain idle, and our own labor be unemployed. During the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1887, we imported $683,418,980.70 worth of foreign productions, and of this amount $450,325,321.55 were dutiable goods, and $233,093,659.15 worth of goods were admitted free of duty. Here, then, was more than $450,000,000 worth of the products of foreign labor imported into our country and consumed by our people in one year, upon which the importer paid for the purpose of placing such goods upon our market $212,225,163, or an average rate of duty of 47.10 per cent. Is there a sane man in America who does not believe the amount of our imports would have been largely increased if the rate of duty had been less? Our whole experience in the past has demonstrated that fact. We have seen this forcibly illustrated in the increased amount of imported wool since the duty on that article was reduced in 1883. We have again seen it illustrated in the increased importation of tin-plate and other articles upon which the duty has been decreased. By reason of the Secretary of the Treasury putting a different construction upon the worsted schedule in the act of 1883 from what was intended by the framers of that law, a construction which has largely reduced the duty from what was intended, the importation of worsted goods has been largely increased, and the result has been, as we are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report, that our worsted industry has become nearly ruined. If this be the effect of a reduction of the duty on worsted goods what must be the inevitable effect if we take the duty entirely off from wool and other articles, as proposed by this bill? Must not the industries which are engaged in producing the articles mentioned be destroyed also?

During the fiscal year which ended June 30 last we imported $16,351,370 worth of raw wool and $44,235,244 worth of woolen goods, notwithstanding our high rates of duty, but if we take the duty entirely from wool and reduce that on woolen goods, as proposed in this bill, I think we can safely presume that more than $100,000,000 worth of wool and woolen goods will be imported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890. It is proposed by this bill to reduce the duty on steel rails from $17 per ton to $11. What must be the result? Either a reduction of wages for the labor engaged in producing steel rails or else a large increase in the amount of steel rails imported. The duty will by this bill be reduced on such rails about one-third, but should the amount imported be increased by the lower duty one-third, then what have we gained? We have collected the same amount of revenue for the support of the Government, it is true, but we have deprived our own furnaces of the business or work necessary to make the extra amount of rails we have imported, and to that extent deprived our own laboring people of employment. During the fiscal year 1887 we imported of iron and steel 1,783,251 gross tons, not including iron ore, which amounted to 1,194,301 tons more. If the duty had been what is proposed in this bill, can any one doubt but that the amount imported would have been largely increased? To the extent which the wants of our people are supplied by imported goods made in Europe to the same extent must our factories, shops, and furnaces remain idle and our workmen remain unemployed.

It is said that notwithstanding our protective tariff wages are low and many of our people are unemployed. Whether wages are low or not depends somewhat how we make comparison. If we compare the rate of wages to-day with the average rate of wages before the war, under our low tariff, we will find they are much higher now than then. There never was a time when the amount received by the wage earner for his work would buy so many of the necessaries of life as at the present time. The per cent. of our population who are out of employment to-day is not greater than it has been, on the average, for the last forty years, with the exception of the time during the war and for a few years following the same. During the war a million and more of our laboring men were engaged in saving the country and hence the demand for labor gave all employment, and it took some eight years after the close of the war for the nation to recuperate and to supply the necessities of the people. But if wages are too low what remedy do the friends of this bill present for relief? They propose to largely reduce the duties upon foreign imports, and to throw open our ports to the free importation of many articles which are produced abroad and can be produced here. In other words, they propose to increase the supply of our own people from the production of foreign labor, which, of necessity, must decrease the consumption of similar things which should be supplied by our own shops and produced by our own people. That the average rate of wages in France and Germany is from 75 to 100 per cent. less than in the United States we think there can be no question, while the average rate in England is from 60 to 75 per cent. less than here.

This fact is clearly established by the reports of our consuls and by the reports of the bureau of statistics in the several countries named, as well as by the personal observation of those who have traveled in the European countries mentioned. In 1883 the average rate of wages in the branches of trade mentioned, in the city of Berlin, Germany, was as follows: Locksmiths, without board, $4.28 per week; journeymen masons, $5.35; journeymen carpenters, $4.99; painters, the same; house painters, $3.37; pavers of streets, foremen, $7.37, journeymen, $6; common laborers on streets, $3.21; apprentices at such work, $2.85; journeymen tailors, $4.28; harness-makers, $3.09. These figures were taken by myself from the original report of the bureau of statistics of the city of Berlin. The city of Berlin has a population of over 1,300,000 people. Compare these figures with the rate of wages in New York, in Washington, or any other of our larger cities. Mr. Carroll D. Wright, our able Commissioner of Labor, and formerly holding a similar position in the State of Massachusetts, in his sixteenth annual report for said State, makes a general comparison of the average rate of wages for the year 1883 in England and Massachusetts, as well as the average cost of living in each country, assuming that similar articles are used and in like quantities. He gives as the result of his investigation the average rate of wages in Massachusetts as $1.77 to $1 in England, while the average cost of living is as 100 in Massachusetts to 87½ in England, or while the cost of living in England is about 17 per cent. less than in Massachusetts, yet the average rate of wages is 77 per cent. more in Massachusetts than in England. He shows further that the difference in the cost of living in Massachusetts and England arises almost wholly in the item of rent.

The people in France, England, and Germany are able to subsist upon the pittance which they receive for their labor simply because they do not live one-half as well as do the wage-earners in our own country. They are compelled to exercise the greatest economy, and every member of the family becomes a wage-earner as soon as they are of sufficient age, the women often performing the hardest and most burdensome kind of outdoor toil. I trust the day will never come when our women in America shall be compelled to perform such labor and bear such burdens as they do in the countries named. I do not mention these things for the purpose of showing what effect protection or free trade may have in the countries named; whether free trade in England or protection in Germany is advisable and best I shall not undertake to say, for I contend that what may be good policy in this respect in one country might be ruinous in another. England maintained her protective policy until but a few years ago. She built up her manufacturing industries under a protective policy until the products of her factories exceeded those produced in any other country. Her statesmen saw that she was unable to produce food for her people, and that she must rely largely upon the productions of her factories and her foreign commerce to sustain her government and people. She was unable by force of circumstances beyond her control to build up diversified industries. But how different is it with our country!

We are told by our free-trade friends that we have been enabled to pay higher wages in this country than could be paid in Europe because of our cheap lands and immense natural resources, and that our protective tariff has had no tendency to increase wages; but this statement we insist can not be sustained. It is true we have an immense country—a land bounded by oceans and stretching from the lakes to the gulf—a country possessed of all kinds of climate and soil, and with more natural resources and wealth than any other country in the world; but we neglected to develop this wealth and utilize these natural resources until after the enactment of our tariff laws in 1861. It was our protective tariff which induced our capitalists to develop the wealth of the nation, which erected our furnaces and built our factories, which has thrown open our iron and coal fields, constructed our railroads, and opened our forests, and thereby given employment to our labor; and so far as I am concerned I desire to see that policy continued which has made our blessed land grow and prosper beyond any other. I have mentioned the low rate of wages in England, France, and Germany simply for the purpose of showing what we must compete with in our own land. How, I ask my free-trade friends, are we to pay for labor in this country nearly twice as much as is being paid for similar labor in the countries named, and yet market our products in competition with that produced abroad, unless we in some way give advantage to our labor and industries by our tariff laws?

Protection enables us to maintain the balance of trade in favor of our own country. A nation, like an individual, which spends more than its income for that which it can dispense with is, like an individual, on the road to adversity. It is said that England imports more each year than she exports, and that she is still a wealthy nation. This is true; but England is a creditor nation. She holds the obligations of many other governments as well as of thousands of foreign corporations, and has to a large extent the carrying trade of the world. Her income from these sources far more than exceeds the balance of trade against her. We, on the contrary, are a debtor nation, and to meet the interest and principal of our obligations, national and corporate, held abroad, we must export more than we import and sell more than we buy. The financial history of our country shows the effect of having the balance of trade run against us for a number of years in succession. In 1837 we had a great financial panic, reaching all over the land and well remembered by our older people. At this time the balance of trade had been against us for several years. From 1848 to 1857 the balance of trade against this country amounted to $336,000,000; and many more of our people remember the great financial crash of 1857. From 1859 to 1873 the balance of trade against our country amounted to the immense sum of $1,086,000,000, and during the same time we exported of our gold to meet this balance, as far as possible, to the amount of $690,000,000, so that in 1873 we had but little or no gold left in the country.

Who does not remember the financial disaster of 1873? These illustrations show the effect of buying, as a nation, more than we sell, or importing more than we export. Actual experience like this is the most convincing evidence that can be adduced for establishing any proposition of this kind. It is true we had our protective tariff from 1861 to 1873, but during a portion of this time a million and more of our producers had become consumers and were fighting to save the nation's life, and we were unable to supply the demands of the people, and our wants were supplied largely by excessive importations. It seems to me that common prudence should prompt us not to increase our importations by reducing our rates of duty upon foreign imports. We are told that our tariff upon foreign goods is a grievous burden upon the consumers in the land. There is no evidence adduced to establish the assertion. There is no class of our people to-day that are complaining that what they buy is too dear so much as they are complaining that what they have to sell is too cheap. The laborer is not complaining so much that what he buys is too costly as he is that what he has to sell, his labor, is too cheap. The farmer complains because his products sell so low, and not because his groceries and his clothing cost too much. His wife does not complain because she is compelled to pay too much for her calico, her dress trimmings, and her tea, but she does complain because her butter, her eggs, and her cheese bring so small a price. Our free-trade or low-tariff friends who are seeking to supply the wants of the consumer with cheaper goods might well turn their attention to the producer and laborer who are seeking a better price for that which they have to sell. While our protective policy tends to preserve our home market for our producers, so it tends to cheapen manufactured goods to the consumer.

This was the opinion of that great champion of human rights and human liberty, Horace Greeley, who fell a martyr in his efforts to reform the Democratic party. Said he:

> No man can truthfully suggest one article which, having been formerly wholly imported, has since, through protection, been so naturalized to our own soil that it is now produced here to the extent of nearly supplying our own wants, which now costs our people more than it did when we imported it from abroad.

I concede that prices of home-made articles are higher for some time after a tariff law goes into effect, but upon most articles this increased price is but temporary. The correctness of this statement is fully confirmed by actual experience in our own country. We see it in the case of Bessemer steel, of woolen and cotton goods, of nails, saws, axes, of table cutlery and crockery-ware, and all other articles that can be named which are produced here in such quantities as will nearly supply our own wants. Our protective tariff has stimulated invention and improvement, and built up these great industries which now compel foreign countries to compete with us for our home market subject to the duty upon their goods which we make them pay for such competition. The more factories there are the more competition we have and the cheaper goods we get. It is said that if protection tends to cheapen manufactured goods, what advantage is a protective tariff to the producer or manufacturer? I will answer that a protective tariff tends to give him a more stable market for his wares, and insures him a fair price for his product, and aids him in getting started in building up his business, while at all times it saves him from an unjust and unequal competition with the foreign producer. It is said that a protective tariff is detrimental to the interest of the farmer; but this I deny.

Supposing that our Democratic free-trade, tariff-for-revenue-only friends shall succeed in passing this bill, every industry it strikes must either reduce the wages of the people employed therein or else close the shops, furnaces, and factories which give them employment. In either event we will witness increased "strikes," "lock-outs," and a million of wage-earners that are now finding work will be thrown out of employment and of necessity be driven to tilling the soil. These men, who have been consumers of the products of the farm, will become producers. The farmer needs no more competition in his chosen pursuit. That which he produces to-day scarcely compensates him for his labor. If these people who are now engaged in other pursuits are to become tillers of the soil and producers of wheat, corn, and potatoes, where are the agriculturists to find a market for that which they produce? We shall not find it in our own country, because by our overproduction we have ruined our home market. We have increased producers and decreased consumers, and increased our productions beyond any foreign demand. We shall in fact become a nation of agriculturists, and no nation ever has been or ever will be prosperous where its people are wholly or chiefly engaged in agriculture.

It is our protective tariff which has largely built up our varied industries, and which has tended to make us the most prosperous nation in the world. A protective tariff tends to aid and build up all our industries, to bring the producer and consumer nearer together, and thereby largely save the cost of transportation. This has made more valuable the farm and given a better market for its products. This is what has made lands near our large cities more valuable than those more distant. This is why the lands in rough and rocky New England and in sterile New Jersey are more valuable than our fertile lands in Michigan and Minnesota. Every farmer knows well that he can not send to foreign lands his potatoes, vegetables, and many other things which he grows upon the farm, and that he must rely upon the home market for the same. Hence it is all important that he should feel a deep interest in the building up of manufacturing towns and cities near his home, where he can market his surplus productions. It is for this reason that we see them often voting a tax upon themselves, or aiding by voluntary contribution to assist in building railroads and in the erection of factories. They understand perfectly well that it is to their advantage to build up these towns and bring the consumer of their products near to them, and to make distant markets more accessible. Every farmer who produces wool understands full well that he can not raise wool in competition with that which is produced in Australia or South America. The President of the United States and free-trade Congressmen may try to convince them that free imported wool will be to their advantage, but their own practical experience tells them otherwise.

At every farmers' convention, as well as at every wool-growers' gathering, we see these men pronouncing and protesting against putting wool on the free-list. More than three thousand farmers in my own district, representing all parties, have sent me their protest. Here is an industry more diversified over the country than any other. In Oregon, in California, in Colorado, in Ohio, in Texas, in Michigan, and Vermont, we find the wool-growers and farmers protesting against this measure, which they believe is to destroy this great industry. Where are the Representatives here who are to voice the will of this large portion of our population? Where is the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and his Democratic associates, who generally so readily respond to the appeal of the farmers? We find them upon this question turning a deaf ear to these appeals of the people whose interest they are to guard. The representatives of the wool-growers and the wool manufacturers met in this city, and they gave to this House the result of their deliberation. These men represented no political party, but they did represent great interests. They demanded not free wool and reduced duty on woolen goods, but they demanded that the tariff laws should be revised so that these industries should be preserved and protected. The representatives of these industries and all others have been denied a hearing by the committee which reported this bill. Their petitions have been unheeded and their prayers unheard. Strike the blow at these industries which you threaten, and its echoes will be heard on the 6th day of November next.

In 1860 we imported $38,000,000 worth of woolen goods, while our domestic supply was but $61,000,000, and $99,000,000 worth in all was consumed by our people, or on an average $3.17 worth per capita of our population. In 1880 we imported $33,000,000 worth of woolen goods, and our domestic supply was $238,000,000, and we consumed $5.35 worth per capita. This shows that our people used $2.18 worth more per capita of woolen goods in 1880 than they did in 1860, although woolen goods were cheaper in 1880 than in 1860. Our people dressed better and lived better and earned more wages per capita in 1880 under our protective tariff than in 1860 under our revenue tariff. In 1860 we had 22,471,275 sheep, and the wool-clip amounted to 60,511,343 pounds. In 1870 our sheep had increased to 28,477,951 and our wool-clip to 100,102,387 pounds, while in 1880 our sheep numbered 40,765,900, and our wool-clip was 240,000,000 pounds. In 1884 our sheep had increased to 50,626,620, and our wool-clip was 308,000,000 pounds. In 1883 the duty on woolen goods and wool was reduced, as it was on other things, and then the number of our sheep commenced to be reduced, and the wool-clip was lessened, so that in 1886 it only amounted to 285,000,000 pounds, and in 1887 to 265,000,000 pounds, as estimated by Mr. Dodge, of the Bureau of Statistics of the Agricultural Department.

The increase in the number of sheep from 1810 to 1860, fifty years, was 100 per cent., and in pounds of wool 350 per cent., while from 1860 to 1885, twenty-five years, the increase in sheep was 140 per cent., and in pounds of wool 375 per cent. Here is illustrated the practical effect of our protective tariff upon the wool industry. Under our protective policy we see that the number of sheep, as well as the amount of our wool-clip, has been largely increased, while after the reduction of duty in the tariff revision of 1883 we see the number of our sheep decreasing from year to year, and our wool-clip diminishing. Gentlemen may theorize all they please, but the practical experience of our farmers is here illustrated beyond question, and this illustration is more convincing to them than any theory that can be advanced by all the free-traders in this House and the President of the United States combined. In 1860 the average weight of the fleece was less than 3 pounds, while at the present time it is 6 pounds. Here again we see that not only has the number of sheep largely increased under our protective-tariff laws, but there has been great improvement in our flocks and in the amount and quality of the wool produced. In 1860 we produced on an average but little over 2 pounds to each inhabitant, while in 1885 it reached 5 pounds to each inhabitant.

Our sheep are not only valuable on account of the wool they produce, but valuable also for the meat they furnish, and for enriching the lands of the farmer. Pass this bill, and this industry which is national in its importance will be ruined, for within this bill exists a disease more fatal to sheep husbandry than any "rot" that ever entered the farmer's flock. What substitute has the farmer for the industry you are about to deprive him of? When his crop of grain fails him, as it does at times, he is often able to meet his obligations, pay his help, and clothe his family for that which he may receive from a bountiful crop of potatoes and other vegetables, or from hemp which is grown in some of the States; but his home market for these you propose in this bill to take from him. You passed but a short time ago a bill to tax substitutes for butter that you might protect the dairy interest of the country, although these substitutes were produced by our own people; but now, when the productions of foreign lands are seeking to obtain the home markets of our farmers, the Chief Executive of the nation sounds the keynote, set to free-trade music, which makes glad the hearts of foreign producers and saddens the heart of the American farmer; and here to-day we see the whole power of the Administration, with its public patronage and public plunder, wielded in favor of the passage of this bill, which, if it shall become a law, must inevitably destroy our American industries and depress our American labor. Is the power of the Executive with its public patronage greater than the power of the people with their ballots? Pass this bill and make the issue, and the ides of November will answer the question.

In 1860 we had 1,263 woolen establishments with a capital of $30,922,654, consuming 83,608,468 pounds of wool, and producing $65,596,364 worth of goods, while in 1880 we had 2,689 woolen establishments, employing 161,557 persons, and having invested $159,091,869 capital, and the value of the product amounted to $267,252,913. Here we see that the manufacturing industry has kept pace with that of wool-growing. In 1860 the entire production of our worsted mills amounted to only $3,230,000 worth of goods, while in 1880 it had increased to $33,549,942 worth. In the revision of our tariff laws in 1883 language touching the duty on worsted goods seemed to the Treasury Department indefinite and obscure, and a construction has been given to the act by which it is conceded by the Secretary of the Treasury the worsted industry is fast becoming ruined. Other language used in the revised tariff laws of 1883, like that in the classification of "wool-tops," "waste," etc., has under the construction of the Treasury Department worked great injury to the woolen industries, and these imperfections should be remedied without delay. We imported during the last fiscal year (articles of a similar nature being produced by our farmers) and upon which a duty was paid, of flax about $2,000,000 worth, which paid a duty of 8.09 per cent.; hemp, jute, and other vegetable substances, about $10,000,000 worth, with rate of duty 17.81 per cent.; breadstuffs $6,386,560 worth, average rate of duty 16.84 per cent.; animals $4,665,066 worth, average rate of duty 20 per cent.; hops $3,117,662 worth, average rate of duty 42.64 per cent.; vegetables $2,276,304 worth, average rate of duty 24.05; hay $791,686 worth, average rate of duty 18.80 per cent.

Now, these articles, as well as that of wool, which I have mentioned, and many others, lessened to the extent they were imported the demand of similar articles produced by our own farmers. It is proposed by this bill to put many of the articles named upon the free-list. If this shall be done can any one doubt that the imports of such articles will be largely increased to the great injury of our farmers? The friends of this bill seem to think that our farmers should confine their labors to the raising of wheat in the North and cotton in the South, and that the surplus of these productions can be exchanged in England, France, and Germany for the manufactured productions of Europe. If England wishes to buy bread to feed its operatives it seeks it in that country where it can acquire it the cheapest, and it does not wait to exchange other commodities therefor, as our free-trade friends would suppose. We see this in the increased amount of bread kind which it is receiving from India. In 1871 only one-half of 1 per cent. of the wheat imported into England was supplied by India, while in 1887 it amounted to over 11½ per cent.; and it is evident that the time will soon come when India will be able to supply the wheat necessary to feed the English people at a less price than the same can be produced here. It is folly, in my judgment, to talk about increasing the export of the productions of our farmers by increasing the imports of the foreign laborer. Your effort in that direction must simply result in decreasing the home market of the American farmer. It is conceded by the chairman of the committee that if the bill is passed it will largely increase the imports from Europe, which in itself must decrease the amount produced by our own labor. The sole reason why goods can not be produced as cheaply here as in Europe is that the rates of wages are so much higher here than there.

But it is contended by our free-trade friends that high wages mean decreased cost of production, and hence cheaper goods. This idea was first advanced by Mr. George; but a little investigation will show that such is not the rule. It is true that by reason of improved machinery wages in nearly all branches of business are higher than they were thirty or forty years ago, but this arises from the fact that by reason of improved machinery the productive power of labor is much greater now than then. This is clearly shown by the chairman of the committee [Mr. MILLS]. He says, in speaking of print cloth, that—

Each operative in 1849 made 44½ yards per day, in 1884 98.2 yards per day, an increase of productive power of 120 per cent. The average daily earnings of the laborer in 1849 were 66 cents, and in 1884 $1. His wages increased 50 per cent. and the labor cost of the product decreased 32 per cent.

Here, then, was an increase in wages of 50 per cent. and decrease cost of labor product of 32 per cent., making 82 per cent. Deduct this from 120 per cent., the increased power of production, would leave 38 per cent., which it will be claimed is increased profits on the labor; but we must take into consideration that the improved machinery cost more and it took more capital to conduct the business and more money to keep it in repair, and to make good the wear and tear thereof, to keep it insured, etc. I have no doubt the profits of the manufacturer were somewhat increased, but certainly not to as great a per cent. as was the wages of the laborer. This same principle holds good in every illustration that the honorable gentleman from Texas has given. It was not the higher wages of the laborer that materially increased his productive power or cheapened the product of his labor, but it was the improved machinery that increased his productive power, cheapened the production of the laborer, and enabled the manufacturer to increase his wages. But it is claimed that our machinery is superior in productive power to that of England, but the facts will not warrant the statement. Much of the machinery in our woolen, cotton, and other industries came from Europe.

England, like our own country, generally adopts the best and most modern machinery in its factories, and it can not be successfully claimed that England is behind our own country in skilled workmen. Every person familiar with manufacturing in our country knows that in many of our factories, especially if they are comparatively new, much of our most skilled labor comes from abroad. This is no disparagement to our workmen, because England for a much longer time has been educating her people in her factories. There is no people in the world with such an inventive genius as our own, and none so quick to comprehend and understand complicated machinery and operate the same. A large proportion, I think some 38 per cent., of our operatives in the cotton and woolen factories are foreign born or have foreign parentage. Now, if they have equally as good machinery in these industries in England as here, what reason is there for supposing that the English operative can produce more in our country than when he is in his native land? Boots and shoes ready made by machinery are as cheap here as in London, France, or Berlin; but you go to a shop and have the same articles made to order by hand, and they will cost you 50 per cent. more here than there on account of the less rate of wages there. A good suit of clothes or a dress can be made in Europe at much less cost than here for the same reason. A large manufacturer in Berlin some three years ago told me that where we could produce an article almost or entirely by machinery that they in Germany could not pay our duty and compete with us, but where there was much hand labor used in its production they could pay our duty and undersell us in our own markets on account of their lower rate of wages. The less hand labor used and the more machinery in the production of an article the nearer we can come to competing with the English manufacturer, and the less machinery and more hand labor used in the production of an article the less nearer we can come to competing with the foreign producer; and if one will study our importations and compare the same with our rates of duty this statement will be confirmed.

These facts apply in the pursuit of agriculture and other industries as well as to manufacturing. Free raw material is the shibboleth of this Administration, provided such "raw material" is something produced by the farmer. Wool, hemp, potatoes, and other vegetables are to be placed upon the free-list, but iron ore and other things dug from the earth are to remain protected by this bill. Is wool any more a "raw material" than iron ore, or hemp any more of a "raw material" than slack coal? If the principle of free "raw material" is good in one case, then why not in the other? The whole theory of putting so-called "raw material" upon the free-list, as claimed by our free-trade friends, is that this will give to the manufacturer cheaper material and enable him to produce goods at so low a cost that he can sell them in the markets of the world in competition with similar goods produced in Europe. This theory is not sustained by our past experience. It has not been the case, to any great extent, in the case of cotton goods or leather goods where there is no duty levied upon the raw material. But, if the theory was true, are we not making too great a sacrifice when we destroy many of our industries in order to build up or increase our foreign trade? But we are told by the President—

That our present tariff laws are vicious and inequitable, and that the primary and plain effect is to raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties.

Mr. Chairman, this statement has been refuted so many times that it seems almost useless to further discuss the question. There is scarcely an article that can be named that the foreign producer does not himself have to stand more or less of the duty levied by our Government by a reduction of the price of his commodity. The duty on a square yard of calico is 4½ cents, which is more than the wholesale price for prints in our country to-day.

According to the President's theory were it not for our duty on prints, calico would cost us nothing. The same suggestions might be made touching many other kinds of cloth, both cotton and woolen, as well as many articles in metal, wood, etc. There is a duty on wheat of 20 cents per bushel, and on potatoes of 10 cents. Only think what a bonanza the farmers would have if every bushel of wheat they produced was enhanced in price 20 cents, and potatoes 10 cents, by reason of the tariff. I am quite willing to concede that there are many articles upon which there is a duty levied, if such duty was removed these things would, for the time being, be furnished to the consumer cheaper than now; in other words, that the duty does on some articles enhance the price; but if by taking off such duty we are thereby compelled to reduce the rate of wages of our people, and lessen the necessaries of life which they now enjoy; if we are thereby to ruin and destroy our industries, to lessen the productive power of our factories and furnaces, and to retard the general prosperity of our country, as we must, then, sir, this bill should not pass. It was said to me by a free-trade friend but a few months ago, that he was opposed to protection upon general principles, and insisted that America was able to compete with the world, and the laboring people here ought to have pride enough to do so without raising their wages by artificial means; but the American laborer can not feed and clothe his family or himself as he desires upon the simple pride that he is able to work for the same wages that the wage-earner works for in England, France, or Germany. If the farmer is producing his crop at an actual loss when his labor and the cost of his investment in the farm are considered, it is no great comfort to himself to be able to say that he has sold his productions as cheap as the same could have been supplied by the foreign producer.

Again, we are told that while we have a tariff which tends to keep out the production of foreign labor, yet we levy no duty upon the foreign laborer himself when he enters our ports. That is true.

More than thirty years ago, when my own State was under Democratic rule, she had for four years a paid agent in Germany soliciting immigration to our State, and this policy of soliciting immigration has been continued by our State until within a few years ago. This policy existed in many other States until recently. Public sentiment is not now, I am glad to say, in favor of encouraging foreign immigration, but no policy has yet been devised, and, in my judgment, will not be devised, which shall prevent honest, intelligent, and able-bodied citizens of other countries whose principles and habits of life are not inimical to our form of government from seeking a home in our country, where they seek such home for the purpose of becoming part and parcel of our citizenship. Our free-trade friends do not object to the productions of these people when in Europe coming here to supplant the productions of our own people, but, sir, if their productions are to be consumed by our people I prefer that they should produce them here rather than in Europe; then their wants are supplied, and they are fed and clothed by the productions of our own people, instead of being fed and clothed by the productions of Europe. When here they help to enlarge our home market, but when abroad they simply help to supply our home markets.

Mr. Chairman, it has been often said that words are sometimes uttered to reveal thought and sometimes to conceal the same, but language never ought to be used to deceive those to whom it is addressed. I can not think for a moment that the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] intended to deceive this House when he used the following language, but that his language is misleading in substance and in fact there can be no question. He says:

Here is a coarse wool suit of clothes such as our working people wear in their daily toil in the shop and field. The whole cost is $12. The labor cost is $2. The tariff duty is 40 cents per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem. As the weight is not given, we can not get the exact tariff, but the duty on woolen clothes imported last year averaged 54 per cent., and at that rate the tariff stands $6.48 to cover $2 of labor cost.

Any one not familiar with the gentleman's statements would suppose from this language that the expense of all the labor in producing such suit of clothes, including taking the wool from the sheep's back, washing and scouring the wool, spinning the yarn, weaving the cloth, and cutting and making the suit, was but $2, when as a matter of fact I suppose he means that the cost of labor in simply the making the suit was only $2. I am not familiar with the actual cost price to the wholesale clothier for the making of such suit; but I am inclined to think that if he had inquired of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], who is familiar, I dare say, with the matter, he would find that $2 for the making was less than the average price. But the gentleman from Texas says that the duty upon the suit of clothes would amount to $6.48. Let us examine the matter and see if any such statement is warranted. The gentleman has been too long a member of the Committee on Ways and Means to be unfamiliar with the manner of levying duties on foreign imports. He certainly must know that the duty is levied upon the actual market value of the article in the place and country where purchased or produced, and not upon the actual market value of the article here, yet he figures the rate of duty upon the market value of the article here and the retail price at that, and he impliedly says to this House and to the country that such is the law and the practice in levying duties upon foreign imports.

If this suit of clothes retailed at $12, the wholesale price was probably about $10, and not over that. Now, if the duty on the imported suit is added to the cost price, as claimed by our Democratic friends, let us see what the suit would have cost in Europe. The suit of clothes would have cost in Europe $10 at wholesale price, less the rate of duty. In other words, the suit of clothes in Europe at wholesale market price would have cost $6.52, and if the suit weighed 3 pounds, the average weight, the duty would be $3.48, making $10. We see from this that the duty would have been $3.48 instead of $6.48, as stated by the honorable gentleman from Texas. The real facts are but little or no clothing of this price and description is imported, because the same can be bought in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Washington nearly or quite as cheaply as in Paris, Berlin, or London. The language used by him in the other illustrations which he gave touching the duty and cost of labor is, so far as I have examined, equally as misleading as this which I have given. I have the highest regard for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, but I must say that in my judgment he owes it to the House and to the country to so correct his language that the same shall not be misleading, but harmonize with the facts. It is true that the surplus revenues of the Government are excessive, but not to that extent which the President or his Democratic friends represent. That party has become so used to falsifying the financial record of the country touching this surplus, that the President himself has been deceived, or else he, too, is trying to deceive the country.

The Democratic party said in its platform in 1884 that the country had been collecting $100,000,000 surplus revenue annually, when there was collected during the very year in which this declaration was made less than $18,000,000 surplus; but it is conceded now by the leading administration paper of this city that the Democratic platform of 1884 was a fraud. In the Post of the 20th instant I find this item, and it is a choice item, too, because so true:

"Mr. Cleveland presents the peculiar spectacle of a man asking for re-election to office because he repudiates the platform which he approved and was elected upon three years ago"—Omaha Republican.

This is not true; but if it were it would be entirely to the President's credit. The Chicago platform of 1884 was a good deal of a fraud.

The Republican party disposed of its surplus by paying off the Government bonds, while the Democratic party is hoarding up such revenues. The Republican party while in power was constantly reducing taxation, and thereby decreasing the revenues. It did this by reducing internal taxation, and by the placing of such things upon the free-list the importation of which did not come in competition with our own productions, until we have increased the value of our imports on non-dutiable goods to from a few million dollars' worth to over $233,000,000 worth. Speaking for myself alone, and I believe the sentiments of those who sent me here, I am ready to co-operate with any party in still further reducing our revenues, but it must be in continuance of the policy of the Republican party, as stated above. I am willing that such reduction shall be made partially upon internal taxation by removing the tax on tobacco, raw and manufactured, not including cigars and cigarettes; and partially by placing on the free-list that article which would least harm the industries of the country.

Tobacco may be considered a luxury, but it is now, and ever will be, I fear, used by a great portion of our people, especially among our laboring classes; and there is scarcely anything they consume that they would not prefer to dispense with rather than their tobacco. Its use is not so degrading or immoral as to warrant the Government in prohibiting its use either by taxation or otherwise. The time has not yet arrived, in my opinion, when we should remove the tax upon alcoholic and intoxicating liquors. Public sentiment would not warrant such a step at the present time. Its excessive use is degrading and immoral, and public sentiment is now demanding that its entire use shall be prohibited where possible, and curtailed to its lowest limit in all places. This tax, in my judgment, is a tax upon that the use of which results in evil, and it tends somewhat to limit and restrain such evil. For this reason I am not willing at present to relieve it from taxation. So long as the use as well as abuse of liquor can not be prohibited, I am desirous of retaining such laws as will tend to curtail and restrain its use to the lowest possible limit. I would further reduce our revenue by placing sugar upon the free-list; not that I am willing to give up the idea that we are not to in time produce in this country our own sugar, but because we can render aid to that industry in a more economical and better way. I think it has been quite safely demonstrated that we can not or shall not produce sugar to an amount sufficient for our own use from the cane, but if produced at all it must come from the beet or sorghum, and I think from the latter. I am quite willing to foster the industry still further, but we can far better afford to do so by bounty rather than by a duty. We consumed of sugar in 1887, 2,781,159,646 pounds, valued at $68,882,884, and the duties paid thereon amounted to $56,507,495. We produced in our own country only, I think, about one-twelfth of what we consumed. We can well afford to pay a bounty to still further encourage our sugar industry, to an amount which would be more beneficial to the producer than the duty now levied, and the people would still save in the process of encouragement more than $40,000,000 annually in the cost of their sugar. I am willing to give the bounty, because I wish if possible to build up another great branch of agricultural industry, which if successful will soon bring to that class of our people more than $100,000,000 annually.

Gentlemen tell us that we have prospered notwithstanding our protective tariff, and that our prosperity would have been greater had our protective policy not existed. The experience of our country has been different. We had for some years previous to 1857 a low revenue tariff, and let me call a Democratic witness to show what the condition of our country was at that time. On December 8, 1857, President James Buchanan, in his message to Congress, used this language:

The earth hath yielded her fruits abundantly, and has bountifully rewarded the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and up to within a brief period our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in abundance, yet notwithstanding these advantages our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present time in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions and elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of our useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

This condition of our country continued to exist, and in 1860 our national Treasury was bankrupt, and the credit of the Government was so poor that it could not borrow without paying higher rates of interest than that paid by individuals. Compare the credit of your Government after twenty-seven years of our protective tariff with its credit in 1860, after twenty-seven years of low tariff.

Look at the general prosperity of our country during these last twenty-seven years of its existence. In 1860 we had less than 30,000 miles of railroad, while to day we have more than 145,000 miles of such road, or enough to encircle the globe six times, with miles of telegraph enough to more than twelve times girdle the earth. Look at the wonderful increase in the products of our forests and our mines, of our furnaces and factories. Look at the wonderful increase in the production of our silks, our glassware, our china and pottery, and in all those things which tend to bring happiness and prosperity to the people. Shall we go back to that system of legislation which bankrupted our Treasury and ruined our public credit; that system which depressed our industries, which pauperized our people, and utterly failed to develop our natural resources; that system which made us dependent upon the labor of foreign lands for that which we wore and consumed, or shall we stand by that system which has made us the most wealthy, the most prosperous, and the greatest manufacturing nation in the world? It is between these two systems that we, the representatives of the people, are to choose, and I welcome the issue. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, by unanimous consent Mr. BREWER'S time was extended ten minutes.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, the question presented now is one, generally speaking, of tariff reduction, not abolition. It is true that the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means proposes to enlarge the free-list, but the main object of the measure is to reduce, not abolish the tariff. And in considering this question we should do so from a standpoint having regard for the interests of the whole nation. We should not seek to build up the industries of any one State at the expense of other parts of the country. In all our legislation we should consider the general welfare of the entire nation; not what might benefit a few, but what policy will most add to the happiness and prosperity of all the people of the United States.

That the present tariff law does not, in its application, add to the prosperity of the great mass of the people must, it seems to me, be evident to every fair-minded, unprejudiced man. A tariff which gives a comparatively small number of men the right and opportunity to tax the millions of our citizens 47 per cent. more than their goods will sell for in the open market, can not fail to have the result of building up and maintaining vast monopolies and trusts, whose enormous profits are swelled and increased by the tribute which the tariff authorizes them to levy from the pockets of the people.

As a noted French writer has well said, the system of a high protective tariff is founded upon the theory of creating a scarcity of commodities. Suppose a man is engaged in the manufacture of bar-iron. He is anxious that his competition should be limited, in order that he may obtain a higher price for his iron. Therefore he comes to Washington and gets Congress to put a high tariff on imported iron so as to lessen his competition and produce a scarcity of iron in this country, which allows him to compel those who buy iron to pay him a higher price. That man has not the general welfare of the whole people at heart. His selfish desires do not harmonize with the prosperity of the masses.

Our present war tariff considers the interest of a few, not all.

Sir, Congress has no right to take the part of a few manufacturers against the great body of consumers. But that is just what has been done. Our war tariff declares for high prices for the producer of iron, low prices for the producer of corn; high prices for the producer of glass; low prices for the producer of wheat. Our present tariff tax aims to secure to a few manufacturers a disposal of their goods at a large profit. To do that their prices must be raised. To raise their prices the supply of their foreign competitors must be diminished. To diminish the supply is to create scarcity.

I would like to ask if the farmers of the West are more prosperous because they have fewer clothes? Are they better off because they must pay an enhanced price for the necessaries of life; because the products of iron, copper, and glass are scarce and high?

But we are told that the present war tariff makes prices cheaper. In the first place our friends, the high protectionists, ask for its continuance because they want to artificially increase the price of imported commodities. What for? Why, of course, so that a few of our manufacturers can obtain a higher price for their wares. But the moment you speak of that to the high-tariff beneficiary, he will say, "Oh, no; the tariff cheapens prices."

W. G. Sumner well illustrates the inconsistency of this claim, and I will state substantially what he says. The laboring man's interest and the employer's interest are, in a certain sense, antagonistic. The laborer is desirous of receiving as high wages as possible, while the employer would like to have wages low; and the consumer wants to purchase the product as cheap as possible. Here we have this state of things when along comes an all-wise Congressman, and he proposes to make everything lovely. To the laboring man he says, "I will make your wages high." "What are you going to do with me?" says the manufacturer. "Do not fear," he replies, "I will make wages low for you." "What!" exclaims the laboring man, "make wages low! Why, you just said you would make my wages high." "Oh, no," says the Congressman, "I am not going to actually make wages low for the manufacturer, but I will make the price of his product high, and that will have the same effect." The consumer upon hearing this exclaims, "Hold on, there! What's that? Do you propose to pass a law to make prices high?" "Oh, no," says the Congressman, "I do not really mean to make prices high, it only looks so."

If a high protective tariff does not increase prices, then it absolutely fails of its object. It is not imposed in order that the Government may raise a revenue. If the Government does collect any revenue under it, it is incidentally accomplished. The Government says, "We do not want this tax; we have got more revenue now than we know what to do with; but we will let the favored manufacturer tax the consumer; we do not want to tax the consumer, but we will hold him while you tax him."

The fact of the matter is, as every observing man knows, that the tendency of prices is to cheapen constantly, not on account of the taxes imposed by our war tariff, but owing to improved means of transportation and production. Prices have declined everywhere. And the prices of agricultural productions, which our war tariff does not benefit to any appreciable extent, have declined out of all proportion to those of manufactured commodities; and, as usual, the farmer has got the worst of it. Prices have declined the world over; they have declined in free-trade England and in China as well as in the United States. But the proposition I make is this, that the price in this country of nearly every article on which our war tariff is imposed would be a good deal cheaper to-day if the tariff were reduced.

According to the natural laws of trade the price of a commodity is fixed by the cost of producing it. But when, by means of a 47-per-cent. tariff, you interfere with trade so that the price of a commodity is not fixed by the cost of producing it, you impose a burden upon the people who are forced to buy it.

That very thing does the present war tariff accomplish. It allows the favored manufacturer in this country to fix a price upon his goods, not with reference to what it costs him to produce it, but with reference to foreign competition. "How much will it cost the people of the United States to obtain this commodity from abroad?" is the question which the American protected manufacturer asks himself. Not "How much can I afford to sell this article for?" but "How much can I compel the people to pay me for it?" This war tariff puts it in the power of the favored manufacturer to force the American people to pay him an unjust price for his wares, if he chooses to ask it.

And all this is done, what for? Not in order to enrich the tariff monopolist. Oh, no. This war tariff is not maintained to put money in the manufacturer's pocket. What, then, is it kept up for? Why, to protect American labor against the pauper labor of Europe. The manufacturer tells us that labor is so cheap in Europe that he must have protection against it; that by reason of the high tariff he is able to pay his workingmen higher wages.

Such a claim, under the circumstances, is preposterous. By placing a tax on imported goods you can not increase the wages of labor. If you can, why is it, after nearly thirty years of the highest tariff taxation ever known in the history of the world, that wages in many of the protected industries have declined from 10 to 60 per cent.? If the tariff of $2 per thousand feet on lumber makes wages higher, why is it that the wages of men in the lumber woods have declined 50 per cent. in the last ten years, while the price of stumpage has advanced from 100 to 800 per cent.?

If you are going to legislate to make wages higher by imposing a tax, you should put the tax on the men, not on the goods. If you want to protect our workingmen against the pauper labor of Europe, why do not you take measures to keep that pauper labor from coming here? Free trade in labor and protection on everything the laboring man buys, and that is called protection to American labor.

No industries show more poverty, more destitution, and more strikes among their workingmen than those so-called protected ones. There is not a hod-carrier in the United States but who earns more wages than the average person employed in the industries benefited by the war tariff.

A tariff tax on imported goods may raise the price of the same kind of domestic goods in this country, but it will not raise the wages of the man here who makes those goods. It takes the capitalist and the workingman combined to turn out the finished product. The capitalist invests his money, manages the business, and attends to the sale of the manufactured product. It is the laboring man's work that creates that product. If the capitalist has the right to ask Congress to levy a tax on imported goods so as to make those goods scarce in this country, and allow him to obtain a higher price for his product, then why has not the man who works for that capitalist the right to ask Congress to levy a tax on immigrants, so as to make labor scarce and increase the price of his wages?

Protection to American labor! Is that the reason why this war tariff is maintained? This is about the way it protects the laborer: Here comes a ship-load of goods. The custom-house officer says to the importer, "Pay to the Government of the United States 47 per cent. of their value." "What for?" says the importer. "To protect American labor against the pauper labor of Europe," replies the custom-house officer. The importer pays the tax and adds it to the cost of the goods, and that tax is ultimately paid by the consumer. By and bye there comes another ship to our shores. "What have you got there?" is asked of the captain. "Two thousand Italian immigrants," he replies "Bring them ashore," says the custom-house officer; "right over here in Pennsylvania we have ten thousand men now on a strike because they can not make wages enough to keep soul and body together; take your men over there and help us protect American labor." [Loud applause.]

Your tariff keeps out foreign goods in order to help the manufacturer meet foreign competition. If the capital engaged in an industry can not meet foreign competition, much less can the American workingmen meet it. As Robert Walker truly said:

A protective tariff is a question regarding the enhancement of the profits of capital, and not the augmentation of the wages of labor.

But it is to the farmer of the United States that the advocates of this trust-creating tariff make their strongest appeal. He is told by them that he should stand by American industries. That the agitation for the reduction of the war-tariff taxes is being stimulated and encouraged by British manufacturers and British gold. They frantically call upon the farmer to continue on voting to keep up a tariff which is taxing him out of house and home; they paint in glowing colors the advantages the farmer derives from a tariff on certain agricultural productions, and they beg, bully, entreat, and threaten that the farmer's influence and the farmer's vote may be given to prevent any relaxation of the tight grip which the war tariff now has upon him. If the farmer will use his reasoning powers and the common sense with which the Creator has endowed every human being he will not be caught by this chaff. What is it fixes the price of the majority of our agricultural products? It is the price of those products in the markets of the world. And it is amazing that the intelligent farmer will allow himself to be bamboozled and humbugged on this very simple and plain proposition.

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADE. If the gentleman's view is correct, why should not the farmers form a "trust" and manufacture the articles which they consume, and thus protect themselves?

Mr. FORD. If the gentleman will listen until I get through, I think I will convince him——

Mr. WADE. You do not show me how to get a better market for my wheat. You say I have got to come in competition with this foreign labor. You do not offer me anything except cheaper articles. Now, why would it not be better to form a farmer's trust and let the manufacturers manufacture their own articles?

Mr. FORD. If the gentleman will only possess his soul in patience, I expect to satisfy him before I get through. I have only just got started. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADE. And then tell me how those laborers in South Carolina, who work for $10 a month——

Mr. FORD. I decline to yield for any more interruptions. Make your speech in your own time, or else "hire a hall." [Laughter.]

What is it that fixes the price of the farmer's wheat? It is the Liverpool market. Let the price of wheat go up in Liverpool, then watch how quick it will advance in Chicago. Let the price of wheat in Liverpool decline and the market in Chicago will respond instantly, and go down. We can not begin to consume our agricultural productions. We produce a good deal more than enough to supply the United States, and are obliged to depend upon a foreign market for the disposal of our surplus. No tariff can help the farmer on his surplus production, because the price at which it is sold is fixed by competition with all the producers of the world. We now consume at home about 70 per cent. of our agricultural productions and export about 30 per cent. of them.

Now, mark this: Whenever any country produces more than it consumes and has a surplus, the price of that surplus will fix the price of the whole product. Therefore, so long as our farmers produce a surplus (and this they will always do) the price of the agricultural productions in the United States will be the same as the world's price. There is no escaping this conclusion. You may pile tariffs on wheat, corn, beef, pork, and cotton mountains high and it will not increase the price of those products in this country a penny—not a farthing.

The farmer's wheat is sent 3,000 miles away to England, and it there comes into direct competition with wheat from the East Indies, raised by the worst pauper labor on the face of the globe; a labor so low and so half-civilized that the American farmer can scarcely conceive how degraded it is. The price of one of the most important of the farmer's crops is thus fixed by competition with wheat raised by laborers whose dress consists of half a yard of cotton cloth, and who work for 6 cents a day.

But how is it with regard to the articles which the farmer can not produce and which he must buy? The price of nearly everything which the farmer buys is fixed by so-called protective legislation. The English farmer stands a little better in that respect than the American. The price of what the English farmer buys is fixed in the same market and and by the same laws which fix the price of what he sells; while, as for the American farmer, the price of what he sells is fixed by competition in the open markets of the world, and the price of what he buys to produce his crops is arbitrarily determined and unnaturally increased by the laws of of the Congress of his own country for the benefit of a few manufacturers.

But the duty on wool is one of the strong points of the tariff monopolists. They and all their subsidized newspapers are talking continually not about coal, not about glass, not about iron, but about wool. They have constituted themselves the special guardians of the wool tariff, and are overwhelmed with anxiety to save the farmer from utter destruction from a decrease of the tariff on wool. I very much doubt the sincerity of some of these new converts to the farmer's interest. It might be well supposed that they were more anxious for their own particular industries than for the farmer's. To an unprejudiced observer it would look very much as if some of them were using the farmer as a cat's-paw to further their own interests.

If the tariff on wool benefits the farmer, what does it amount to? Taking the entire value of our agricultural productions, the wool crop does not comprise over 2 or 3 per cent. of it. What a short-sighted policy it is for a farmer to calmly submit to paying war-tariff prices for nearly everything he buys to produce his crop, all for some supposed trivial benefit derived from the wool tariff on 2 per cent. of his product. These tariff-tax manufacturers ask the farmer to pay $15 for a $9 suit of clothes for himself, $17 for a $12 shawl for his wife, to pay increased prices on his plows, tools, and agricultural implements; they ask him to sell his produce for a niggardly sum, and they tell him to meekly endure all this, and to be comforted by the thought that there is a tariff on wool.

You can not have a good price for wool unless you have somebody to buy it. We do not produce enough wool for our own consumption. Our manufacturers must import foreign wool; and when you artificially increase the price of foreign wool you cripple the manufacturing industry, which injures the farmer's customer. Take the result in my State for instance, the State of Michigan. In 1867 the wool tariff was enormously increased; in that year the tariff on wool was raised, so that it averaged between 50 and 60 per cent., and it so continued, practically without interruption, for sixteen years. In 1867, when the tariff went into effect, there were 4,000,000 sheep in the State; and under the effect of this high tariff on wool on the 1st of January, 1880, the number of those sheep had dwindled down to less than 2,000,000. This wool tariff has induced many farmers to vote for the maintenance of these war taxes. When some farmers have viewed the tariff, the wool has been pulled over their eyes to that extent that they could not see anybody else [Laughter.] But I believe the farmers are beginning to appreciate that in this cry of "Wool! wool!" there is more noise than benefit.

Another statement which has had considerable effect is, that our high tariff gives the farmer a home market. This claim, it seems to me, can be absolutely demonstrated to be false beyond the possibility of a doubt. Let us examine this question and see how much of a home market these tariff taxes have given the farmer. We consume at home about 70 per cent. of our entire agricultural productions, and export about 30 per cent. Our farmers comprise about one-half of the population of this Republic, and it is fair to suppose that they would consume one-half of the products of agriculture which are consumed in this country. As we consume 70 per cent. here, our farmers would consume one-half of that amount, or 35 per cent. of the whole crop. The people engaged in manufacturing, mining, and mechanical pursuits, according to the census of 1880, comprise about one-fifth of our population; therefore they would consume one-fifth of the 70 per cent., or 14 per cent. of our entire production. But it is well known that only a small proportion of those engaged in mining, manufacturing, and mechanical pursuits receive any benefit from the present high tariff. To a great number of our industries the war tariff acts as a bane and a curse. Making a liberal estimate, let us assume that of those engaged in manufacturing, mining, and mechanical industries one-third of them are benefited by the high-tariff taxes. Then the amount of the farmer's productions that they would consume would be one-third of the 14 per cent., or 4⅔ per cent. of the whole product—call it 5 per cent. Therefore the consumers which the tariff-trust advocates say they have created for the farmer, and who will give him a home market, only take 5 per cent. of his product, while the farmer's foreign customer takes 30 per cent. of it.

What an insignificant thing this home-market scheme is when the facts are laid bare.

The proposition is that the farmer is to be taxed to support an industry which would not otherwise exist, and he is to get his money back by selling his produce to men who work in the industry. The farmer is to be compelled to pay taxes to help the manufacturer, and he is to get it back in money for his produce! That would be a remarkable investment. As Henry George well says, this is like the man who owned stock in a railroad and kept riding on the cars and paying his fare in order to increase the dividend he would get out of the stock. [Applause.]

The home-market delusion amounts to about this. The protected manufacturer says to the farmer, "I want you to vote for a Congressman who will aid in maintaining this war tariff, and I will agree to take 5 per cent. of your crop. But if I do that I want the privilege of charging you 47 per cent. more than my goods are worth in the markets of the world." In other words, he says: "Out of every $2,000 worth of your agricultural productions I will take $100 worth, and when I pay you that $100 I want you to buy $100 worth of my goods, but I want you to pay me $147 for them," while the farmer's foreign customer says: "Out of every $2,000 worth of your productions I will take $600 worth, and I will let you have $600 worth of my goods without paying any bonus whatever."

Our agricultural productions are always more than we can consume, and our farmers must rely, of necessity, upon the markets of the world. No act of Congress can prevent this. Ever since the war tariff has been in force the farmer's home market has been growing smaller and smaller.

I have a table here, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, which absolutely refutes the pretension that the war tariff has enlarged the home market of the farmer:

Year.	Value of agricultural products (in gold).	Value of agricultural products exported.	Per cent. exported.	Per cent. consumed at home.
1860	No record	$256,560,972
1880	2,213,402,564	685,961,035	31	69

We have no record of our agricultural productions in 1860, but we have data of the agricultural exports for that year. We find that the exports of the products of the farm are constantly growing and growing. We find that in 1870 this country bought 82 per cent. of our agricultural productions, and in 1880 it bought but 69 per cent. of them. Observe what this wonderful American system has done for the farmer. After wearily waiting year after year for that home market which the high-tariff advocates told him would surely come, what is the result? In 1870 the farmer was obliged to look to foreign countries for the disposal of only 18 per cent. of his crop, and after ten years of war-tariff taxation, under which monopolies have grown rich, and trusts have become defiant, he finds his home market ebbing away, and that he must go abroad to sell 31 per cent. of his productions.

The result of this home market swindle is, that the farmer is most beautifully deluded. The high-tariff party gets his vote; the trusts and monopolists get his money, and the farmer gets the hot end of the poker.

They also attempt to frighten the farmer by saying that if the war tariff is reduced it will damage these monopolies so much that they will be compelled to cease manufacturing, and thousands of workingmen will be thrown out of employment; and that these men will seek agriculture as an occupation, and compete directly with the farmer. I do not believe a single man would be thrown out of employment by the passage of the tariff bill recommended by the majority of the committee. But let me suppose for a moment that it would result in throwing men out of employment, would these idle men turn their attention to farming? Not at all, because a reduction of the tariff would so stimulate those industries which our natural resources have fitted us for that an increased demand for labor would at once spring up in those pursuits. By reason of a cheapening of the cost of raw materials those manufacturers would be able to compete in foreign markets. And a reduction of the tariff would result in an enormous increase of production, in order to supply the foreign demand, which would increase the demand for labor to such an extent as to furnish employment for all idle men, if there were any.

Another scarecrow erected to alarm farmers is the statement that periods of low tariff have brought forth financial panics. But those who make this assertion are very careful to say nothing about the panics that have occurred during periods of high tariff. In that respect it is a very accommodating tariff. For, according to their reasoning, every panic that has occurred during a low-tariff period is directly attributable to the tariff, while panics occurring in periods of high tariff have been due to other causes entirely. The slight reductions which have been made in our tariff taxes, in the history of this nation, have had no bad influence upon our financial condition, but the effect has been the very reverse. When these men make this statement they fall into the error of mistaking a coincidence for a cause.

How does the present tariff take care of the farmer's interest? According to the census of 1880 the assessed valuation of the capital engaged in agriculture was twelve billions, and in manufactures two billions. The profits of the manufacturers on invested capital was 37 per cent., and the profits of the farmers was 11 per cent. Our farmers comprise half our population, and it would seem that if any industry should be aided by the Government it is that of agriculture. Why have the high-tariff party advocated a tariff on wool, and wheat, and rice, under the guise of protecting the farmer? Why did they not place a tariff on some of the farmer's productions which might have given him some benefit? While these gentlemen have been, as they allege, endeavoring to protect American labor against the pauper labor of Europe, why have they not paid some attention to the egg and poultry industry? The value of the products of the egg and poultry crop of the United States exceeds the entire value of our pig-iron. But what war-tariff advocate has ever raised his voice for this portion of the farmer's productions? None. Is there any tariff on eggs? There is a tariff on the yelks of eggs dried and powdered; and there is a tariff on baked ants' eggs for birds' food. But there is no duty on the hen's egg. Are there any imported? Oh, yes; about 14,000,000 dozens last year, free; no tariff on them at all. Why have not these representatives of the pig-iron manufacturers, and of the alleged wool growers, who are tumbling over each other in their eagerness to benefit the farmer, said something about saving our egg and poultry industry from foreign competition? Why should not the great American hen be protected against the pauper hen of Europe? [Laughter.]

If the present war-tariff tax is necessary to sustain the American workingman, why is it that wages are higher in industries not affected by the tariff, than in those which are benefited by it—which is a fact easily susceptible of proof?

If this high tariff is kept up to maintain our infant industries, why is it that it is given to the manufactures of cotton, wool, and iron? The manufacture of cotton cloth had a fixed establishment here sixty years ago. The manufacture of woolens was firmly settled in this country over seventy years ago. And ninety-seven years ago Alexander Hamilton said that the manufacture of pig iron was well established here, and that we had the ability to manufacture steel sufficient to meet all internal demand and have left a considerable surplus for exportation. Are not these infant industries becoming rather aged? Ought they not to get along without the nursing-bottle?

If the present 47 per cent. tariff tax is a benefit to the farmer, why is it that the price of the majority of the farmers' products is the lowest ever known? And why is it that the farmers' financial condition is constantly becoming worse?

It is proposed now to reduce the tariff on manufactured commodities. The tariff-tax beneficiaries say that a reduction would ruin them. Let me examine this claim a moment.

What profit do these men make? That is a very difficult matter to arrive at. There is no law which requires them to make a statement of their gains and losses; and so any knowledge on that subject is not easy to obtain. But occasionally something occurs which compels a disclosure. An instance of this kind is found in a suit between the stockholders of the Jackson Iron Mining Company in the Lake Superior country. The Jackson mine, in all respects, is an average of the iron mines in Michigan. In that suit, in 1883, it became necessary to know the exact dividends declared by that company for the past twenty years. The secretary of the company took the witness-stand, and testified that since the organization of the company in 1863 (twenty years) they had declared a total dividend of 1,785 per cent., an average of 89¼ per cent. a year. Their original capital stock was $300,000, the dividends declared had been $5,355,000, and the value of the plant in 1883 was $1,500,000. So, out of an original investment of $300,000 the stockholders had taken out over $5,000,000 in profits, and they still had a plant left valued at $1,500,000, which alone was 500 per cent. more than they had originally invested, making a total of 2,300 per cent. profit in twenty years, or an average of 215 per cent. a year. But still these men now say they can not compete against the pauper labor of Europe, and demand that the duty of 75 cents a ton on iron ore be left unmolested.

Take the copper mines. The Quincy Copper Mining Company of Michigan, in the ten years ending with 1881, paid an average dividend of 50 per cent. per year. The Calumet and Hecla copper mine, with about a million dollars invested, pays over 200 per cent. every year. In 1861, when every expedient known to taxation was resorted to, to raise a revenue to carry on the war of the rebellion, among other taxes there was a duty of 2 cents a pound placed on copper pigs.

Finally the war ended, and the necessity for a large revenue did not exist. But in the mean time the copper-mine owners of Michigan had had a taste of this "protection against the pauper labor of Europe," and they sent a lobby down here and got the tariff on copper increased to 4 cents a pound. Think of it! A war tariff of 2 cents, a peace tariff of 4 cents. This duty is practically prohibitory. Last year the Calumet and Hecla Mining Company paid a dividend of $2,250,000—over 200 per cent.—and the Government received in revenue from imported copper pigs the princely sum of $40. [Laughter.] And this same company has shipped copper to England, and, after paying the transportation charges, they have sold it at a less price than it is sold in New York. And yet they have the effrontery to say that they can not compete against the pauper labor of Europe.

According to the report of the commissioner of labor of Michigan for 1887, we find that 47 per cent. of the farms in that State are mortgaged. Here we have the spectacle of the farmers of Michigan eking out an arduous existence, with half their farms covered by mortgages, while the copper and iron trusts of that State, to whom the war tariff forces the farmer to pay tribute, are making annual profits all the way from 50 to 225 per cent. It passes my comprehension how any man can vote to uphold a system of taxation under which this state of affairs is maintained.

The pretense that we can not compete with the cheap labor of Europe, in my judgment, is entirely unwarranted. Why, sir, pauper labor is unprofitable labor to employ. And the comparisons between the rate of wages in this country and Europe, which are brought forth by interested corporations and trusts to show a necessity for a high tariff, are, in most instances, extremely misleading and unfair. Because one man demands $2 a day for his labor and another man $1 a day, it does not follow that it is more profitable to employ the one who works for the cheaper wages.

Granting that our workingmen receive higher daily wages for their services in this Republic, than those of Europe, what does that signify? It means that our workers are worth more to their employers. If the two-dollar-a-day man can produce three times as much annually as the dollar-a-day man, his employer can well afford to pay him the higher wages. In no country upon the earth are the laboring classes more intelligent, acute, and active than in the United States. And the proper way to compare the reward they receive for their services, with those of other countries, is with reference to the quantity of finished product produced.

I will illustrate this by taking the statistics in regard to the cotton manufacture. From a report recenty submitted to the State Department by Mr. J. Schoenhof, our consul at Tunstall, England, I glean some very significant facts. From a knowledge of the daily wages paid in England, Switzerland, and the United States, it would appear to be a hopeless task for the American manufacturer to attempt to compete with the manufacturer of Europe; but when we look at the production per hand employed it is at once made plain that the American manufacturer has by far the advantage. The labor cost of weaving per day in Switzerland is 49 cents, in England 65 cents, and in America from 80 cents to $1.12. But let us look at the quantity produced. The cost per 100 yards in Switzerland is 60 cents; in England 55 cents; in the United States 40 cents. It is apparent from this that while our cotton manufacturers pay the highest daily wages, they pay the lowest per 100 yards manufactured; consequently, their labor cost is not as great as that of the foreign manufacturers. This same state of affairs exists in reference to the cost of labor in most of the so-called protected industries.

It is no argument to say that we can not compete with foreign manufacturers because our daily rate of wages is higher. If everything were equal; if each country had the same machinery and processes, the same intelligent labor, and if the result of a day's work per hand employed were the same, then a comparison of labor cost upon the daily wages paid would be upon a proper basis. But in most instances we can afford to pay more daily or weekly wages for our labor, because it produces enough more than the foreign labor to make up for the increased daily cost of it.

The minority of the Committee on Ways and Means have submitted 16 printed pages of what they denominate their views; and it is a remarkable document. In view of the all-absorbing question of reduction of revenue one would imagine that they might have brought forth something more than a criticism.

I have here an article from the Minneapolis Journal, a prominent Republican newspaper of the Northwest, which indicates how the views of the minority were received by the Western Republicans:

> If the Republican leaders of the House were conscious of the real intensity of the feeling among Western Republicans in favor of the Republicans in Congress formulating a liberal tariff-reform measure, and placing the party on record in favor of an honest and intelligent reduction on the necessaries of life, they would not fail to submit some such proposition in Congress. They certainly can not realize the true state of feeling among Western Republicans, or they would see the serious danger in pursuing the present policy.
> There is no excuse for it. There is no reason why the Republican Representatives should not have drawn up and presented to the House long ago a measure which should stand as a clear and definite statement of the Republican position with respect to tariff reform. The failure to do so is the most serious aspect of the political situation. It is producing a feeling of restlessness everywhere among Western Republicans that threatens party disintegration. This is not stating the case too strongly.

When the situation demands a statement of the position of the Republicans in Congress upon this question; when a failure to make such statement "threatens party disintegration" among the Western Republicans, the Republican members of the committee do what? Nothing. They propose nothing, they advocate nothing; they simply demur.

Just consider this: Over and over again have prominent Republicans in official life declared that this war tariff ought to be reduced. President Arthur recommended it. The Republican tariff commission said:

Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded.

What does the bill propose to do? The average duties for 1887, on the articles outside the free-list which the bill affects, were 65 per cent. If the bill becomes a law, it is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that the duties on those articles will average 48 per cent. In other words, instead of making the people pay a tax of $65 on every $100 worth of these goods when imported, this bill reduces it to $48 on every $100—a reduction of only $17. A Republican President and the tariff commission advised it. But the gentlemen of the minority of the committee call it "a radical reversal of the tariff policy of the country." President Arthur recommended an enlargement of the free-list and a reduction of the tariff on cotton, iron, and steel. That is what this bill seeks to accomplish. The minority view it as "an overthrow" of the tariff.

Again, the minority of the committee say that a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $17 to $11 a ton will "seriously cripple if not destroy the manufacture of steel rails in this country," when the facts are that if the duty on steel rails to-day were $11 a ton, as this bill proposes to make it, it would not increase the importation of steel rails one single ton—no, not one pound. This is very easily demonstrated. The price of steel rails now in England is $18.75; add $2 for freight to this country, and the cost of the imported rail in New York before paying duty would be $20.75. If the duty were $11 a ton, that would make the English steel rails cost $31.75 a ton here. What is the price of the American steel rails? They are selling for $31.50 a ton to-day, or 25 cents a ton less than the English rails could be delivered for in this country if the Mills bill were a law.

The minority of the committee also state that a scaling down of the duties would have the effect to increase the revenues instead of diminishing them; because, as they claim, the importations would increase, and, for the purpose of substantiating that proposition, they have selected out a few commodities, and proceed to show that after the tariff reduction of 1883 the importations of those commodities increased, and that the revenue received from duties on those articles was greater than before reduction. Their selection of commodities is manifestly an unfair one. In that selection they have ignored some of the most important and necessary articles of commerce. In the following table I have taken a few ofthe leading articles the duty on which was reduced by the tariff law of 1883, and compared the amount received in revenue before the tariff reduction, with the amount received in revenue for the fiscal year of 1887, after the tariff reduction; and in every instance there was less revenue received after the reduction than before:

Articles.	Tariff before reduction of 1883.	Tariff after reduction by act of March 3, 1883.	Duties collected during year ending June 30, 1883, under old law, before reduction.	Duties collected during year 1887, under new law, after reduction.	Decrease in revenue.

In 1883 the steel-rail manufacturers made the same complaint that the minority of the committee do now, that a reduction of the tariff would ruin them; that it would result in increased importations and increased revenue for the Government. Notwithstanding their protests the tariff on steel rails was reduced from $27 to $17 a ton. What was the result? Did it ruin them? Oh, no! Did the importations increase? No. The year before the tariff was reduced the importations of steel rails were 118,062 tons, and the year after the tariff was reduced the importations were 7,971 tons—a falling off in the importations of over 110,000 tons. Did the revenue increase? Not at all. The revenue derived last year from the tariff on steel rails was over a million dollars less than it was the year before the tariff was reduced.

The dress-goods manufacturers made the same argument. They said in 1883 that a reduction of the tariff on dress goods would result in such enormous importations of foreign cheap-made goods that the American manufacturer would be driven into bankruptcy. The result was the very opposite. Importations have not increased; and under a reduction of the tariff on dress goods of about 20 per cent. the revenue from that source has decreased over $3,000,000 annually.

The tariff on buttons and button molds was cut down 18 per cent., and the revenue in 1887 was $264,000 less than it was in 1883.

The tariff on hats, bonnets, and hoods was reduced 25 per cent.; and the revenue from those articles last year was $131,000 less than it was under the old tariff.

Therefore it will be seen that it is not a good proposition to say that a reduction of the tariff means increased importations. The tendency as regards the great majority of articles on the tariff schedule, in case of a reduction, will be the other way, a decrease of revenue; because it will force the so-called protected manufacturers who are now making from 25 to 250 per cent. profit annually, to accept a more moderate reward. And the moment the tariff is reduced they will meet their foreign competitors with a corresponding reduction in the price of their goods.

Mr. Chairman, I believe there exists no necessity for the further continuance of these war-tariff taxes. On the contrary, I believe every interest of the American people cries out for their reduction. Their maintenance has resulted in the establishment of some of the most vast and arrogant monopolies this country has ever known. And of late there have appeared numerous soulless entities which menace the prosperity of the people, known as trusts. These irresponsible organizations are multiplying so fast that they will soon enchain and fetter the commerce of the nation, and absolutely control the price of the necessaries of life unless their onward course is speedily checked. These associations seriously threaten the well-being of the country. And shall we sit here and allow this spoliation to go on, without an attempt to grapple with and arrest the invasion of this recently organized enemy of the people? If this country were open to the competition of the manufacturers of the world, the great majority of these trusts could not exist. If the war tariff had been reduced years ago, as it ought to have been, most of the trusts in operation to-day would have been unheard of.

The following is a list of a few of the trusts, together with the amount of bounty the present tariff seeks to allow them to collect from the people, also their expense for labor, and the excess of tariff bounty over the amount they pay in wages. Not one of these trusts could live were it not for the war tariff:

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging, per cent.—	Adjusted to guaranty a bonus in each $100 of product amounting to—	Their whole expense for labor in $100 worth of product being—
Salt trust	50	$33	$25
Earthenware trust	56	36	40
Bessemer-steel trust	84	46	9
Plow-steel trust	45	33	29
General steel trust	45	33	29
Nail trust	45	33	22
General iron trust	45	33	25
Copper trust	24	22	22
Zinc trust	52	28	25
Tin trust	32	24	21
Lead trust	74	43	65
Glass trust	55	36	45
Soap trust	26	19	8
Linseed-oil trust	54	35	5
Rubber shoe trust	25	20	24
Envelope trust	25	20	11
Paper-bag trust	35	25	15
Cordage trust	25	20	12
Average	.....	30	24

The above table, which is taken from a pamphlet entitled "Tariff Chats," by Henry J. Philpot, of Des Moines, Iowa, well illustrates the glaring hypocrisy of the claim that the war tariff must be kept up so that these trusts and combines may receive protection against the labor of Europe. The average bonus which the tariff allows these eighteen trusts to exact from the people is $30 upon every $100 of their product, while their whole expense for labor amounts to only $24 upon every $100 produced, leaving $6 tariff bonus over and above the entire labor cost. I would like to inquire how long the war tariff must be kept above the entire cost of labor in order, as they say, to offset the difference between the cost of labor in this country and the cost of labor in Europe.

Alexander Hamilton said, in the Federalist:

> There are persons who imagine that import duties can never be extended to an injurious excess. Exorbitant duties on imported articles tend to render other classes of the community tributary in an improper degree to the manufacturing class, to which they give a premature monopoly of the markets.

That is exactly the situation we are in to-day. The trusts and combines have got a monopoly of the market.

They have got such a grip on the pockets of the people, under the guise of protection to American labor, that it is a difficult task to force them to relax it. Heretofore all attempts to shake them off by a substantial reduction of the war tariff have failed, because they have been powerful enough to defeat every effort in that direction.

They have vilified and abused the advocates of a reduction of tariff taxation, they have accused them of being enemies of the country's welfare, of being in league with the British; in fact, they have appealed to every instinct of the American people, selfish and patriotic, to vote to sustain this system of war-tariff taxation. But I believe the time has now come when the people, and particularly the farmers of the West, are awake to the true meaning of this issue, and that they will soon speak in tones not to be misunderstood, and demand that Congress pay some heed to the great body of consumers of this nation, and pass a measure relieving them of a portion of the taxes which the war tariff now compels them to pay for the benefit of a few manufacturers. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, I will not vote for this bill. I trust it not will become a law. It is entitled "A bill to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue." In my opinion, should it become a law it will not reduce taxation, it will not decrease the revenue, nor will it simplify the manner of collecting it. It will change the articles on which revenue is collected, but it will increase in the aggregate the revenue therefrom so far as customs duties are concerned. In other words, the reduction occasioned by the transfer of articles now on the dutiable to the free list will be overcome by the increased importation of those art icles on which the rates have been reduced. Our experience of the past few years demonstrates this to be true. That we have a surplus revenue and that it should be reduced all will concede. How is the reduction to be made? That is the controversy. I would make it in a spirit of fairness to all our interests and with a desire to protect our agricultural, mining, and manufacturing industries and the labor and capital employed therein, and not with a declaration of war against them all, as I find in the Mills bill, now under consideration. This reduction should be made by the friends of the protective system, not by its avowed enemies.

The President in substance tells us, in his message of December 6 last, that if we have an industry in our midst that after years of trial, with the aid of our tariff system, has succeeded in standing erect, and contending with the incoming waves of the world's competition, at the same time furnishing our people with cheaper and better fabrics than they ever had before, that, to use his language—

> It is entirely evident that one thing has been discovered which should be carefully scrutinized in an effort to reduce taxation.

In other words, when, after long years of bitter struggle, the victory is ours, the general in command of our conquering forces, because of our success, surrenders us to the defeated foe. Just as we have completed the beautiful structure at which we have been engaged for years, and the people are about to fully enjoy the labor of their lives, one who by the strange mutations of political forces temporarily holds the position of architect-in-chief of the edifice, astounds us with an order to proceed with the work of tearing it down.

The moment one of our industries is self-sustaining, is in a healthy condition, the hum of its machinery making constant and attractive music to the ear of its labor, then it invites thereby and receives the President's enmity, and he at once suggests the pruning-knife of the tariff reformer's law. This portion of President Cleveland's message, for cold-blooded indifference to the interests of the people and for active and bitter opposition to the great system by which they have prospered and their country grown great, is entitled to precedence over all emanations from the Executive Mansion in all our history. In this is he isolated, alone in his suggestion, entitled to and deserving of the fame it will bring. From such a spirit as this, dominating as it does almost with a single impulse the Democratic side of this House, I would save our industries and our homes. The Mills bill was conceived by minds impregnated with this economic viciousness, and its friends, in the wild zeal of their impetuous advocacy, in fulfillment of the old adage, "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad," cite it as its chief merit.

The passage of this bill will be the death knell of protection. While it is not all that its friends hoped for, it is in the line of legislation they long have sought, and mourned because they found it not. If they succeed now they propose next year to take another step, and gradually but surely we are to be marched into the camp of those who contend for "a tariff for revenue only;" and that system, so far as our labor is involved, so far as our industries are concerned, is as bad as free trade. We learn from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, in respect to this measure, that by it we are "starting" on the policy which transfers "many articles from the dutiable to the free list," the system that favors "free raw material," the method of revenue reform suggested by President Cleveland in his last annual message, and favored by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee.

We find this bill places on the free-list timber, unmanufactured wood, sawed boards, staves of wood, shingles, logs, salt, flax, hemp, tin plates and sheet iron, glue, china clay, vegetables, lime, wool, and many other articles not necessary now to mention, but of importance, all enumerated in the bill. The import duties on cotton goods, woolens, glassware, china and earthen ware, iron, steel and the manufactures thereof, are largely reduced. Various other reductions are made, seriously affecting many of our valuable industries.

We are advised by the committee that their bill "is not offered as a perfect measure;" that "many articles are left subject to duty which might well be transferred to the free-list;" and that "many articles are left subject to rates of duty which might well be lessened." From the argument of the committee we find that coal and iron ore are among the articles which might well be transferred to the free-list, and that woolen and cotton goods, earthen and glass ware, iron, steel and the manufactures thereof, are of those articles "the rates of duty on which might well be lessened." It is therefore evident that it is the intention of the Democratic majority to destroy the "system of protection;" to repeal the laws under which our manufacturing establishments have been built up; by which our labor has found employment and become expert; through which our agriculturists have found a market for the products of their farms, and by virtue of which we are strong as a nation and prosperous as a people. I do not believe with President Cleveland, with Mr. Speaker CARLISLE, with the Ways and Means Committee, that our protective tariff laws are "vicious, inequitable, and illogical." I am a protectionist, a believer in the system of a high protective tariff. I am for legislating in favor of my country, her industries, and her institutions, first, last, all the time. I believe in the old Bible doctrine that "he who provideth not for his own household is worse than an infidel." [Applause.]

While my sympathies go out to the oppressed, to the distressed of all lands, my duty is with the toiling millions of my native land who labor that they may live, who in factories, mills, and by furnace doors, who in mines, shops, fields, and forests, who in many and varied honest and honorable ways earn sustenance for themselves and their loved ones by the sweat of their faces, as by the Divine command it was ordained.

I believe in the system of our fathers, in the theory as enunciated by the founders of the Republic, by the framers of our Constitution. I believe that our first Congress was right when it enacted our first protective tariff law, and I think that this, the Fiftieth Congress, is wrong when it endeavors to repeal it. I believe that George Washington, our first President, was grandly right when he advised the enactment of and approved our first tariff law, and I think that Grover Cleveland, our present—and I hope our last—free-trade President, is shamefully wrong when he not only suggests, but uses the power of his great office to secure the destruction of our present tariff system. The history of my country teaches me that Hamilton, our first Secretary of the Treasury, was true to the best interests of our people when he drafted our first protective law, and forces me to conclude that Fairchild, our present Secretary, is false to the trust confided to him when he formulates the present measure.

I believe that Madison, the expounder of our Constitution, was right. When speaking of our protective system he said: "Upon this question we are all Federalists, we are all Republicans." I wish we could say to-day on this question of protection to our industries, our labor, our homes, our flag. We are all Republicans, we are all Democrats. Unfortunately, we can not say so. Our Democratic opponents have raised this issue, and it is best that it should now be squarely met. They elected Mr. CARLISLE the Speaker of this House on this issue, and he organized the Ways and Means Committee in furtherance of it. The Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report devotes himself to an exposition of the beauties of "revenue reform," and the President in his message, ignoring the pledges of his party as we are told they are set forth in the platform announced when he was nominated, makes war on the system he had promised to defend, which promise to a confiding people made his election possible, and, false to his plighted faith, declares the laws he had pretended to believe in "vicious, inequitable, and illogical."

Democratic orators in my State, in yours, Mr. Chairman, all over the land, declared that the Democratic platform meant protection to our labor and our manufacturers, and that Mr. Cleveland was as good a protectionist as Mr. Blaine. Some of them likely believed it. Many of them more than likely did not. I believe my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] did believe it. How terribly was he deceived?

How rudely was he awakened from his dream we know by what he has said and done. By this false claim did they win. By this did the candidate without a record defeat the brilliant champion of the people's cause, as did another comparatively unknown candidate, with the cry of "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of '42," defeat the matchless "Harry of the West," the great commoner whose name and fame we all respect.

Mr. Chairman, "the hand of Esau" will be offered again. Democracy will "put on the very good garments" of Republicanism once more, which she "keeps at home" with her, and "the little skins of the kids" she will put about her hands "and cover the bare of her neck" with them, and she will be able to truly say, "That what I sought came quickly in my way." [Laughter.] And when she is asked, "Art thou in favor of protection?" she will answer, "I am." The voice will be the voice of Jacob, but the device will not deceive this time. The people will not bless, nor serve, nor worship thy party this time. Mr. Chairman, when it comes near to them, the smell of its record will not be "as the smell of a plentiful field which the Lord hath blessed." It can not come again deceitfully and get the votes of the people. They have found it out at last. It has taken them some time to do so, but the revelation is now complete. President Lincoln once said:

A political party may fool part of the people all the time, and all the people part of the time; but no political party can fool all the people all the time.

Mr. Chairman, what is "the tariff?" It is a duty upon articles of merchandise shipped from one country to another, imposed and collected by the government of that country to which the articles are sent. A protective tariff is one where the duty so imposed is sufficiently high to prevent the foreign manufacturer from selling his wares, after paying the duty, at a price low enough to destroy the manufacturer and deprive labor of employment where the duty is imposed. It should be high enough to cover the difference between the cost of labor and material in the country where manufactured and that to which shipped. In our case I would have it a little higher, so as to give our country the advantage. There is nothing wrong in that, is there? If so, I will bear it, for I am for my country all the time.

Now what is a revenue tariff, or, as our Democratic friends say, "a tariff for revenue only?" It is a duty levied upon foreign imports for the purpose only of raising revenue. It entirely ignores protection; it seeks revenue. It begs the foreign manufacturer to fill our ports and flood our land with his wares in order that we may collect revenue from him on their account. By such means we secure a surplus of revenue, not of prosperity. As I understand it, a tariff for revenue is so adjusted as to encourage importations; while a protective tariff is so arranged as to discourage and retard the importation of foreign manufactures.

Mr. Chairman, I trust we will never again have a "tariff for revenue only" in force in this country. We have tried it several times, to our sorrow. We tried it from 1846 to 1861 to our detriment. Mr. Chairman, can you remember those days? They were days of trouble, anxiety, ruin, panic, and bankruptcy. I know, sir, you truly hope that those hard times "will come not again around our cabin doors."

Mr. Chairman, I can remember the incidents, the condition of affairs during a portion of that gloomy period of our history. My first impressions of public affairs, of political matters, were formed then. My lines had fallen unto me in a land, a State, rich in soil, lovely in climate, abounding in minerals, as fair a heritage as had ever been given to the children of men. I wondered why Virginia, "in the race of life," had been surpassed by other sections of my country not so highly favored by nature. Before I had traveled far on the pathway of my manhood I found the cause. It left its imprints everywhere, it poisoned everything. It was slavery, and a tariff for revenue in order that slavery might live. Mr. Chairman, we never had a "tariff-for-revenue," free-trade party in this country until the discovery of the cotton-gin led the owners of slaves to believe that in raising cotton slavery could be made profitable. The idea was to make large profits by importing such articles as the condition of slavery required free of duty, and selling cotton raised with cheap slave labor at high prices. Down to that time the statesmen of the South had been protectionists, John C. Calhoun at their head. But the alluring grandeur of the political Utopia I have mentioned was irresistible. The structure they had helped to raise was destroyed by their own hands.

The protective-tariff system existing previous to and during 1828 was attacked and overthrown. It was the declaration of war between slavery and free labor. The result we know and see and feel. Thank God, the foot of a slave will never again desecrate the soil of the Union. [Applause.] Now let us see to it that the labor of cheap foreign slavery does not render useless the liberty and freedom so won.

Mr. Chairman, can a nation be truly great and really independent unless it have within itself the means of support in war and in peace; unless it can clothe, feed, and manufacture for its people? I think not. In our case the best way to secure that is by a protective tariff, is by fostering and protecting our grand home market. The friends of this bill, in order to reach what they call the "markets of the world," would surrender our home market. Our own market is worth more than all the markets of all the world.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in his speech in support of his bill, tells us that our capacity to produce manufactures "is far in excess of the requirements of our home consumption," and that we should seek the markets of the world. Mr. Chairman, where is this foreign market, this "will-o'-the-wisp" of which the revenue reformer talks so much, but always fails to locate? Why did not Mr. Chairman MILLS locate it? He could not; he can not. He contents himself with such expressions as "in foreign countries," "the markets of the world." Where will we sell our woolen goods, our cottons, silks, iron, boots, and shoes? Are we to destroy our "protection" and then contend with the "protection" the nations of the world have surrounded themselves with? Most all the countries "of the world," the markets of which we are told we should seek, have protective laws, England not excepted. Canada, France, Spain, Germany, Russia, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, Austria, Victoria, and Chili have tariff laws, some as high as from 30 to 40 per cent. ad valorem, while Newfoundland, Belgium, Greece, Holland, New Zealand, Turkey, and many of the islands of the sea have rates from 10 to 20 per cent. Our markets are to be made comparatively free, Mr. Chairman, while the markets of the world are to remain protected. Are we to invade England and undersell her manufacturers? England has more than she wants now. Her warehouses are full to overflowing, her markets glutted, her factories idle, her working people hungry. You will not go to France, Germany, and Belgium, will you? It may seem strange, but it is true that those countries have now driven England to the wall with the products of their cheap toil.

Will you go to Ireland for a market? Better go there for a warning. The industries of Ireland were once comparatively as prosperous as ours are now. Now she has neither home industries, home markets, nor home rule. She was forced to cease manufacturing and to purchase from England, to accept British free trade, to become the victim of the English system. The silk trade of her city of Dublin was once her glory; it has ceased to be. The lace trade of Limerick and the woolen trade of Waterford and Cork sent the fame of the Irish manufacturers to all lands; and now all lands, save British lands, mourn for the desolation of Limerick, of Waterford, and of Cork. The blanket factories of far-famed Kilkenny once commanded the markets of the world, and now no market, not one, knows them. England has them all.

Will you go to Spain, Italy, Russia, and India? Not there, I pray you. God save the free people of my native land from such competition, from such degradation! [Applause.]

We can only reach those markets by reducing our labor, not to the level of, but below the labor of those countries. And so it is with the markets of the world that we find out on the sea. We are different from all other countries in habits, institutions, inclinations, education, resources, and capabilities. Will our friends on the other side of this Chamber never realize this? The nation does not exist, the people do not live to whom, with whom, we can be compared and found upon the same plane. By the protective system we have become the grandest nation on earth, a nation of freemen, whose army of expert, educated, liberty-loving toilers, is the hope of its future and the pride of its civilization, and whose 60,000,000 citizens, monarchs all, supreme in their happy homes, governed by impartial laws, dread no master, fear no king, and kneel to none but their God. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to tear down the walls of protection; I do want to build them up. I do not want to open our ports to the miserably paid and poorly fed labor of the world, but I do want to open our manufacturing establishments to all of our own labor. I am opposed to importing, under contract, the pauper and demoralized labor of the Old World; and I am also opposed to importing, under like contract, the manufactured product of that labor. The one is as bad as the other. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Labor to the fact that it is proposed by this bill to flood this land from mountain to gulf, and ocean to ocean, with the products of the cheap, pauper, convict, contract labor of the world. I trust that he and his able lieutenants, who so zealously and jealously guard the interest of labor on this floor, will ring the alarm and prevent it. He will find this side of the House supporting him unanimously.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in importing "raw material," as it is called, free, but I do believe in employing our own unemployed in utilizing our own "raw material." I do not want this nation to be like other nations; I would rather have it distinctively and especially American. I do not want to increase the "surplus" by reducing import duties. I would rather reduce it by repealing internal-revenue taxes and increasing import duties.

Mr. Chairman, is the Ways and Means Committee correct when it reports that "our capacity to produce is far in excess of the requirements of our home consumption?" Does the fact cited that "many of our mills are closed and many of those still in operation are running on short time" prove that allegation? Surely not.

That simply proves that the people have not confidence in, that they fear and dread to trust the present Administration. That proves, not overproduction, but overimportation. During the last fiscal year we imported of "iron and the manufactures of," of "wool and the manufactures of," of "cotton and the manufactures of," of "tin-plate and the manufactures of," of "glass, earthenware, and china," to the value of over $200,000,000. Most all of it could have been and should have been manufactured here; thereby we would have used our own material, employed our own labor, kept "many of our mills from closing, and prevented many of those still in operation from running on short time." I quote now from the report made by Mr. MILLS, and apply it to the situation I have mentioned:

This condition is hurtful to the manufacturer, to the laborer, and producer of the materials consumed in manufacture. The manufacturer loses the profit on his capital, the laborer loses his wages, and the producer of the materials consumed in manufacture loses the market for his products.

Mr. Chairman, every period of protection in the history of our country has given it prosperity; every era of tariff for revenue has brought to it disaster. President Cleveland's message is cited in this debate as worthy of our serious consideration, as a text from the political gospel from which to exhort. Let me cite you from the messages of other Presidents. Likely they were not as profound students of the science of political economy as is the present Executive, but they certainly were as ardent in their love of country and as devoted to its interests.

President Jackson, in his message of December 4, 1832, said:

Our country presents on every side marks of prosperity and happiness, unequaled, perhaps, in any other portion of the world. If we fully appreciate our comparative condition, existing causes of discontent will appear unworthy of attention, and with hearts of thankfulness to that Divine Being who has filled our cup of prosperity, we shall feel our resolution strengthened to preserve and hand down to posterity that liberty and that union which we have received from our fathers, and which constitute the source and shield of all our blessings. * * * The report which the Secretary of the Treasury will in due time lay before you will exhibit the national finances in a highly prosperous state.

Remember, if you please, Mr. Chairman, that this epitome was written by a Democratic President "of Jeffersonian simplicity," and during the highest protection period of our history, to that date. After that came the "revenue only tariff," the compromise tariff, from 1833 to 1842. By virtue of it our industries were paralyzed, our capital unemployed, our labor idle. Our importers were busy, and foreign manufacturers supplied our markets. Our own establishments for manufacturing were closed and our consumers paid higher for necessaries than ever before. Our people tasted of the very dregs of the bitter cup of "revenue reform." The burden was greater than they could bear, and they reenacted the protective policy in 1842. This is what President Polk said of the situation under that enactment. I read from his message of December 8, 1846:

Since your last session no afflicting dispensation has visited our country; general good health has prevailed; abundance has crowned the toil of the husbandman; and labor in all its branches is receiving an ample reward, while education, science, and the arts are rapidly enlarging the means of social happiness The progress of our country in her career of greatness, not only in the vast extension of our territorial limits and the rapid increase of our population, but in resources and wealth, and in the happy condition of our people, is without an example in the history of nations.

Then came the repeal of the act of 1842. Although "Polk and Dallas had been elected as friends of that measure, Dallasvote thatat thec s destroyed it, and we had the revenue tariff of 1846, known as the "Walker act." From another like it, "Good Lord, deliver us." A few years after its enactment, and while it was still in force, President Fillmore said—I quote from his message of December 2, 1851. To this I particularly request the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who stated in his speech a few days since that the passage of the pending bill would benefit the farmers of this country by stimulating the exportation of grain. President Fillmore said:

The value of our exports of breadstuffs and provisions, which it was supposed the incentive of a low tariff and large importations from abroad would have greatly augmented, has fallen from $68,701,921 in 1847, to $26,051,373 in 1850, and to $21,848,653 in 1851, with a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, of a still further reduction in the current year. * * * The policy which dictated a low rate of duties on foreign merchandise, it was thought by those who promoted and established it, would tend to benefit the farming population of this country by increasing the demand and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets. The foregoing facts, however, seem to show incontestably that no such result has followed the adoption of this policy.

Again do I quote from President Fillmore, from his message of December 6, 1852:

Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer to that extent is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England.

Mr. Chairman, the inevitable result of a tariff for revenue followed. The condition of our country was most deplorable; sad, beyond description. If my friends on the other side take exceptions to my citations from President Fillmore, because he did not agree with them politically, nor believe in the doctrine that they now advocate, I beg them to remember that I have also quoted Presidents Jackson and Polk to the like effect, and surely their testimony should be "gilt-edged" to my Bourbon friends of the Cleveland persuasion. But if they still demur, if they are not yet convinced of the error of their ways, I offer them the following, from one who moved for many years as a chieftain among the captains in the camps of Democracy. They are also the words of a President, one who had achieved the great ambition of his life, and one who from his high position seemed to realize that after all that life was a failure, and that the great party whose battles he had fought, whose victories he had won, and whose honors he had worn, stood for principles utterly destructive of the interests of the confiding people whose destinies were in its keeping, and who in sorrow and much tribulation turned to him for relief. I read from the message of President Buchanan to the Congress, dated December 8, 1857.

The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and until within a brief period our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions, and in all the elements of natural wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

Mr. Chairman, we will change the scene now. After Buchanan came the grandest statesman of our civilization, he who did so much for his country, for liberty, and the Union—Abraham Lincoln—and with him came the Republican party, and with it protection to our industries, our homes, our flag; and since then we have prospered as never before has nation prospered. We will prove it from the pages of our census reports. Let them tell the magical story. I shall use here the statistics cited in my address before the Home Market Club, at Boston, a few weeks since, from which I have already quoted.

In 1860 the value of our real estate was $6,973,006,049; in 1880 it was $13,036,512,952, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. In 1860 we had in the United States 163,110,720 acres of improved land, while in 1880 we had 287,211,845 acres, an increase of 76 per cent. In 1860 our farms were valued at $3,200,000,000; in 1880 at $10,197,000,000, an increase of over 300 per cent. In 1860 our farmers raised 173,104,924 bushels of wheat—in tariff-for-revenue times—and found comparatively a poor market for it; while in 1880 they raised 498,549,868 bushels of wheat—in protective-tariff times—and every peck of it was in demand at a good price. In 1860 they produced 838,794,742 bushels of corn, while in 1880 they raised of corn 1,717,434,543 bushels. These figures relative to our grain are actually bewildering—an increase exceeding the entire production of 1860. A magnificent showing for our agriculturists. And they had a splendid home market for it. Destroy that market and where will they sell? Foreign countries bought all they wanted, all they needed of us, not exceeding 8 per cent. of our crops.

They did not buy because we had to sell, but because they were hungry. We sold the greater part of that small per cent. to England. She is peculiarly situated, a manufacturing hive. Her agriculturists can not feed her artisans. England must go abroad for food. Providing for the future, she has lately expended millions of dollars in constructing railroads to the interior wheat fields of India, where the soil is rich beyond description, and where labor is satisfied with 8 cents a day. This is the competition the American farmer would meet with abroad; this is the competition that regulates the price of wheat in Liverpool. Our farmers are well aware of this, and they realize that the market for their surplus productions is not on the sea, competing with India, with Russia, with Australia, but is at home supplying our protected industries.

In 1860 we produced 5,056,383 bales of cotton, and in 1880, 7,110,717, an increase of, say, 41 per cent.; and still those who live where cotton was king want to go back to the old régime. They remind us of those eminently respectable people mentioned in English history who "would rather die on precedent than live on innovation."

In 1860 we manufactured of cotton goods to the value of $115,681,774 while in 1880 we manufactured of the same articles to the value of $210,950,383, an increase of, say, 82 per cent.

In 1860 we manufactured of woolen goods to the value of $61,894,989 while in 1880 like manufactures had grown to the value of $267,699,507 an increase of $205,804,518—of, say, 333 per cent.

In 1860 we produced 60,264,913 pounds of wool, while in 1880 we clipped 240,213,817 pounds, an increase of 179,948,904 pounds—of, say, 298 per cent.—and all woolen goods cheaper and better than ever before. And still wool, by the bill under consideration, goes on the free list.

In 1860 we mined and consumed 15,173,409 tons of coal; in 1880 we used 79,505,000 tons, an increase of 427 per cent. Mr. Chairman, it is pleasant to contemplate the labor employed in mining and using that coal. In opening the mines, in building railroads to them, in digging iron ore, making it into rails for the roads and the mines, in making chains, picks, cars, engines, and other things too numerous to mention. And, Mr. Chairman, remember that all those so laboring were utilizing the cotton and woolen goods, hats, boots, and other articles manufactured at our protected establishments, and they in turn were consuming the coal so mined, and all were making a market for the products of our farms.

In 1860 we made only 987,559 tons of pig iron, while in 1880 we made 3,835,191 tons. In 1860 we made 235,107 tons of railroad rails, and in 1880 we made 1,208,392 tons. Yet still we import large quantities from abroad. In this land of rich ores, coal, and limestone, with willing, expert labor, we ought to make it all. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see the American market given to American labor.

In 1860 our grand aggregate of national wealth was $16,159,616,068, while in 1880 it was $43,642,000,000, the increase alone nearly twice as much as had been accumulated from the time the continent was discovered down to 1860, as much twice over in twenty years of Republican protection as in the preceding three hundred and sixty-eight years. And, Mr. Chairman, all this has been accomplished under "vicious, inequitable, and illogical" laws, if President Cleveland is right—all this magical change produced without Mr. Chairman MILLS's "free raw material." Mr. Chairman, this cry for "free raw material" is a delusion, a miserable sham; there is no such thing in the sense it has been used in this discussion. Out in West Virginia, in the interior of that State, away from railroads, inaccessible to-day, in our primeval forests, we have mountains of timber, iron ore, limestone, and coal. It is "raw material" now, as it was a thousand years ago.

Our people, and your people, Mr. Chairman, are constructing railroads into those forests, into that land of wondrous mineral wealth, are opening up mines, building furnaces, conquering the wilderness. This can only be done by virtue of a protective tariff. The coal in our mountains, before the mine is opened, is "raw material;" at the mine's opening, on the cars, or in the barge, it is the miner's finished product. The ore dug from the "hole in the ground" is the ore-miner's finished product, the result of his labor, of brawn and sweat, and as much entitled to protection as is the rice and sugar from our plantations or the finished articles from our mills. The tree in the forest is the "raw material" of the lumberman, and when his capital and labor cuts it into logs it is then his finished product, and becomes the sawyer's "raw material." The sawyer runs it into lumber to suit the requirements of our various consumers, and it is still "raw material," until from the hands of our skilled laborers and expert toilers, it becomes, in desk, in chair, in house, in car, in many useful utensils and numerous objects of beauty and of art, the finished product of our wonderful industries.

The wool as clipped from our flocks is not raw material—it is the farmer's finished product; and unless I misread the signs of the times the farmers intend that it shall be protected. The bill under consideration places it on the free-list; President Cleveland so advises; the Democratic majority in this House agrees with him. To do so will destroy the wool industry of this nation, which is the sixth in order of value of our agricultural products—those excelling being corn, hay, wheat, cotton, and oats. Australia is the only country in the world excelling us in the quantity of wool produced—and with that country must our farmers compete if wool goes on the free-list—and in that country labor receives and is satisfied with 8 cents per day. Never by my vote shall the American farmer, shall the flock-masters of the Union be placed on that level, be brought to that degradation. [Applause.]

Already, since the agitation of this question, since the effort made to pass the "Morrison horizontal reduction bill" in the Forty-eighth Congress, has this great industry been seriously injured. In 1883 our flocks, encouraged by the tariff of 1867, numbered over 50,000,000 sheep and produced of wool 308,000,000 pounds. In 1887 the number of sheep had been reduced to about 45,000,000, and the product in pounds in the same proportion. We should restore the duty of 1867, increasing it where necessary, and stimulate this industry so essential to our prosperity as a people, our independence as a nation, and not entirely eradicate it, as we will do by the passage of this bill.

Another great industry, the pottery, will be seriously injured if this bill becomes a law. Under a protective tariff its growth has been extraordinary, presenting one of the remarkable examples of the industrial development inaugurated by the Republican party. Previous to 1861, while we had common or brown earthenware, we virtually had no whiteware potteries. We now have them in many of the States, those in Massachusetts, New York, Indiana, Illinois, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, and West Virginia being of especial excellence, producing wares of the finest quality, equaled by but few, excelled by none. They consume the coal, clay, flint, and feldspar found in many sections of the country, furnishing employment to about 20,000 laborers and support to fully 60,000 of our population, and largely benefiting the entire communities where the potteries and mines are located, and, besides, the consumer of those wares secures better articles and pays less for them than ever before. But the bill under consideration, regardless of these facts, disregarding this great and necessary industry, materially reduces the tariff rates and encourages the importation of foreign wares produced by labor paid on the average at least 50 per cent. less than our labor so employed receives. Why this should be proposed is incomprehensible to me. It will seriously injure our own industry, largely increase foreign importations, and, instead of decreasing, materially increase the revenue from these articles and add to the "surplus" now in the Treasury.

And still, Mr. Chairman, this measure is offered by gentlemen who in political agony cry out, "What shall we do with the surplus?" The question is not hard to answer. Pay our debts with it. Build ourselves a navy with it. Improve our rivers and harbors. Construct coast defenses. Educate our children. Pension the veteran, maimed, and suffering heroes who by their patriotism and their devotion to duty made it possible for us to have a country and a surplus. [Applause.] Provide for the widows, orphans, and dependent parents of those who in their strong manhood shouted in reply to the nation's cry for help, "We are coming, Father Abraham, six hundred thousand more," and who battled for the grandest cause for which men have contended since time was. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we must not destroy our protective system. It has accomplished wonders. It has pleasant surprises still in store for us. It has enabled us to perfect our grand system of finance, the marvel of the world, and has caused our credit to shine with the sun of civilization. It has fostered our industries, built up our manufactories, and opened our wilderness. It has elevated our manhood, dignified our labor, and educated our people. It has made our valleys to laugh in their gladness, and, touching our barren mountain sides, has caused "the waters of commercial prosperity to flow o'er all the land." It has made the flag of our nation typify all that is great of human action, all that is grand of human thought. God only knows what it would not do for us, Mr. Chairman, if President Cleveland and his party would only let it alone. [Great applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. GOFF's time was extended until the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. LANDES. Mr. Chairman, every man on this floor pretends to be anxious to vote for a law reducing taxation. Every one admits the overshadowing question to be tax reduction. We pretend to agree as to the object, but divide upon the method of reaching it. To understand the enormous drain upon the people I have endeavored to ascertain what proportion of the entire volume of the currency of the nation is drained into the national Treasury each year. I have a statement from the Treasury officials, showing the estimated volume of currency in the United States to be:

Gold coin and bullion		$587,350,358
Standard dollars		291,455,789
Subsidiary or fractional silver		76,323,888
Legal-tender notes, estimated loss off		337,981,016
National-bank notes outstanding		260,171,017
Total		1,553,292,068
I declare this statement to be too large by the amount of the lawful money on deposit to redeem of the above national-bank notes the sum of		97,211,845
The true amount of money in the United States April 1 was		1,456,080,223
Of which the Treasury held a surplus of	$130,326,758
And to redeem legal-tender notes	100,000,000
		230,326,758
Which leaves outside the Treasury vaults		1,225,753,465

If, therefore, a single individual had all the money in this nation he would have $1,456,080,223, and no more; and if he had all except the amount now buried in the Treasury he would have $1,225,753,465. The estimated receipts from all sources for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1888, is $390,000,000. We thus find that more than one-fourth of the money of the country will have passed into the Treasury in the fiscal year to end on the last day of next June. At this rate in a little over three years a sum equal to every dollar in the country will have passed into the Treasury vaults. The all-absorbing power of the taxing system of this nation is shown by this statement. When to the national taxes we add the State and other direct taxes we find we are about the heaviest taxed people, according to our money volume, on the earth.

The surplus now in the Treasury will be raised to $150,000,000, it is estimated, by the end of the fiscal year. At this rate, unless relief is given, over one-half of all the money in the country will be absorbed into the surplus fund before the maturity of the first outstanding bonds. The money can only be paid out by the purchase of unmatured bonds at an enormous premium. Many of the holders of these bonds paid little if anything over 50 cents in gold value on the dollar for them, and to be compelled to pay these holders now much more than 100 cents in gold for what cost but 50 is bad financiering and in my humble judgment little less than an unbearable outrage on the tax-payers only to be justified in averting a much worse state of affairs which now threatens us.

That disaster and ruin must come if taxation is not reduced is therefore more than probable. This is the condition to which the President called our attention. It is a condition, he says, and not a theory, which "imperatively demands immediate and careful consideration."

I do not think the President is an alarmist, and rather understates the gravity of the situation when he says:

> The amount of money annually exacted, through the operation of present laws, from the industries and necessities of the people largely exceeds the sum necessary to meet the expenses of the Government.
> When we consider that the theory of our institutions guaranties to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise, with only such deductions as may be his share towards the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him, it is plain that the exaction of more than this is indefensible extortion and a culpable betrayal of American fairness and justice. This wrong inflicted upon those who bear the burden of national taxation, like other wrongs, multiplies a brood of evil consequences. The public Treasury, which should only exist as a conduit conveying the people's tribute to its legitimate objects of expenditure, becomes a hoarding-place for money needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use, thus crippling our national energies, suspending our country's development, preventing investment in productive enterprise, threatening financial disturbance, and inviting schemes of public plunder.

For the year ending June 30, 1887, the revenue amounted to $371,403,277, of which we find public-land sales and other miscellaneous sources furnished $35,292,993; internal revenue, $118,823,391; tariff taxes or customs duties, $217,286,893. Thus we see that distilled spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco produced nearly one-third of the amount. And I am sorry that the bill under consideration touches the internal taxes. I would rather see the taxes raised on the articles of whisky and tobacco 50 per cent. than cut down as proposed, because it will be for the greatest good to the greatest number to increase taxes on luxuries and decrease them on necessaries. It transfers compulsory burdens from the shivering shoulders of the poor and needy to those who bear them from choice. The internal revenue is collected now at a less rate of expense than are the tariff taxes, and the greatest feature in their favor is that every dollar, less the trifling cost of collection, goes into the Treasury, and I believe them the least burdensome of all tax exactions. Senator COLQUITT quotes Thomas Jefferson, the father of Democracy, as favoring this system. Here is Mr. Jefferson's language:

I shall be glad, too, if an additional tax of one-fourth of a dollar a gallon on whisky shall enable us to meet all our engagements with punctuality. Viewing that tax as an article in a system of excise, I was once glad to see it fall with the rest of the system, which I considered as prematurely and unnecessarily introduced. But the prostration of body and mind which the cheapness of this liquor is spreading through the mass of our citizens now calls the attention of the legislator on a very different principle.

One of his important duties is as a guardian of those who, from causes susceptible of precise definition, can not take care of themselves. Such are infants, maniacs, gamblers, drunkards. The last, as much as the maniac, requires restrictive measures to save him from the fatal infatuation under which he is destroying his health, his morals, his family, and his usefulness to society. One powerful obstacle to his ruinous self-indulgence would be a price beyond his competence. As a sanitary measure, therefore, it becomes one of duty in the public guardians.

The comment on these observations of Mr. Jefferson by Senator COLQUITT, in his speech on the subject of tariff reduction, is so suggestive that I here repeat it:

These are Mr. Jefferson's views. He did not think they were undemocratic. He would not advocate a policy that would abolish the tax on whisky, dot the country all over with distilleries, reduce the price to a mere trifle, and fill the land with drunkenness, crime, and vagabondage.

The Senator refers to Mr. Madison's position on the same subject as follows:

MR. MADISON'S POSITION.

Mr. Madison, who may be considered not only the father of the Constitution, but of the fundamental principles upon which the Democratic party is founded, was in the First Congress, and voted for the whisky tax. Though he and Hamilton differed widely in regard to the principles of government, they concurred in using the taxing power to check the excessive consumption of ardent spirits. When Mr. Madison voted for the whisky tax the average rate per cent. of tariff duties did not exceed 12 per cent. Rather than increase this rate on articles of necessity coming from abroad, he preferred to lay an excise tax on whisky and raise the required revenue from that source. What would he say now with a tariff rate of 47 per cent.?

Mr. Cleveland, in his justly celebrated message, approves of this system of taxation. So that it is indorsed by the very founders of the Government and of the Democratic party and by the greatest Democratic statesman and leader of the present time. I will add the testimony of the most conspicuous Republican leader of to-day since Mr. Blaine's retirement, if he has retired. I refer to the utterances of Senator SHERMAN. In 1867 he said:

The luxuries are mostly contained in the items spirits, wines, and tobacco. These are undoubtedly the first objects that ought to be taxed.

In 1882 he declared—

These taxes ought to be left as a part of our permanent system of taxation as long as any other taxes, internal or external, more oppressive, remain on the statute-books.

And speaking of the tobacco tax he further remarked:

This tobacco tax of all others is the easiest collected, the most certain, increasing constantly from year to year, dependent upon an appetite that will be indulged no matter what may be the tax. In other countries where taxation prevails this is a favorite subject of taxation.

True the able Senator has changed about, and as I understand him now he leads the Republican Senators in the fight for free tobacco and double-priced clothing in the other end of the Capitol, while Judge KELLEY leads his party on this floor in the fight for free whisky and double-priced iron. The internal-revenue system has been denominated on the floor of this House by Mr. KELLEY as the "infernal system." I suppose it arose from the fact that there is no protection to pig-iron in this mode of taxation. The civilized nations of the world tax tobacco and spirits, and we know that in France, Spain, Italy, and Austria-Hungary the governments take the manufacture and sale of tobacco into their own hands and prohibit the importation by private persons. In 1887 France, with a population of 38,000,000, derived from tobacco a revenue of $74,991,180, and Italy, with a population of 30,000,000, $51,100,000. Great Britain, with a population of 35,000,000, collected during the year ending March 31, 1887, from taxes on spirits, beer and tobacco, $181,750,000, more than one-third of her entire revenue; from the tax on tobacco there was received $46,835,000. The other nations of Europe obtain a large amount for the support of their respective governments from tobacco taxation.

So that our observation as well as our experience commend the internal system to our favorable consideration when the subjects embraced are tobacco, distilled spirits, and malt liquors. The people understand it; they know when and how they pay the taxes under this system and are uncomplaining because not oppressed by it. It is a voluntary burden, and no one can complain of bearing a voluntary burden, since he may lay it down at his pleasure. The Mills bill proposes to leave a burden of about $95,000,000 on the luxuries taxed by the internal-revenue system, as I understand it.

I now come to the consideration of the tariff system, which has been justly defined to be "an ingenious device of government by which the citizen is chloroformed into unconsciousness of the source and cause of the felt burden which he bears." By this system we see that $217,286,893 were wrung from the people into the Treasury, and I dare say a very large per cent. of those who paid taxes for revenue, or for a tribute to protection, under this system, knew when or how they paid them. Notwithstanding the impalpable manner in obtaining money from the people by tariff taxation, we learn from the last platform of the Democratic national convention the historical fact that "from the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be." We also learn from the same platform that "unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation," and that the tariff should bear "heaviest on articles of luxury" and "lightest on articles of necessity," and that "Federal taxation shall be exclusively for public purposes."

It will be admitted by all, I suppose, that our tariff system as now framed and as it has existed for more than a quarter of a century is not "exclusively for public purposes;" but in the main it proves to be framed to raise revenue for private purposes, namely, for the mill-owners and factory lords of the nine manufacturing States, as I shall show. I do not know how I can better state the different purposes of the two parties in imposing the tariff taxes.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to further discuss or explain the subtlety of the contrivance of our Republican opponents in hiding in the tariff the element of protection as it now exists. It is a crafty device that is equal to the darkest methods of Macchiavelli. I can express my definition of a "protective" tariff in the words of Milton—

This is the artificialest piece of finesse to persuade men into slavery.

I will, however, say that whether a tariff is for revenue for a public purpose or for revenue for the mill-owners and factory lords of the nine manufacturing States, the consumers of the commodities taxed ultimately pay the tax. There are a few artful political orators who falsely pretend and assert that the consumers do not ultimately pay the custom duties or other taxes which are concealed in the price of goods, but that they are paid by the foreigner for his privilege of selling his goods in this market.

In answer to such claims I will quote the following from an editorial in the high-protective newspaper known as the New York Tribune. In speaking of pensions it says:

The pensions are not paid by direct taxation. They are paid out of custom-house duties (tariff taxes) and internal-revenue taxes. These are eventually paid by the consumer of the article taxed.

The taxes are concealed in the price the consumer pays to the merchant for the commodity he buys.

Whoever buys a nail, a hoe, an axe, a yard of cloth, a spool of thread in all the tens of thousands of stores and shops where merchants sell their wares, meets there the tax-gatherer taking taxes for the Government or bounty for the manufacturer.

Our protective tariff practically clothes the mill-owners and factory lords of the nine manufacturing States with the power to levy taxes equal in amount to over 47 per cent. of the value of their goods, for their own gain, on all the people who consume their commodities. Not a dollar collected for protection goes into the public Treasury. Measuring the cupidity of the factory lords by the limit of the taxing power, which is over 47 per cent. on the aggregate value of all goods covered by the tariff, and the sum of a single year's profit can be surmised, when we remember that they manufacture and sell six or seven billions of dollars' worth annually to the 60,000,000 people who constitute for them the home market.

The aggregate of the profits to the manufacturers is problematical, and estimates differ. Professor Arthur L. Perry, of Williams College, a careful, painstaking, and conscientious, economic student, states that—

After long-continued study of the proportions, it is my firm belief and conviction that the Treasury only gets about $1 out of $5 paid by the people under the protective-tariff taxes since 1883.

Under this proportion the people paid, concealed of course in the price of what they bought, $217,286,893 into the Treasury and $869,159,572 into the profit-account of their masters, the mill-owners. This is their tribute to the home-market policy.

Protection means wealth to the protected and corresponding poverty to the people at whose expense it is obtained. A hundred years ago protection was granted as an incident to foster our infant industries. To-day these industries are greater in capacity and more perfect in organization than those of any other country on the earth. The tariff of Washington and Hamilton averaged 8½ per cent. and was raised in 1792 to 13½ per cent. Mr. Hamilton, in one of his letters in the Federalist, remarked, "Exorbitant duties tend to render other classes of the community tributary in an improper degree to manufacturing classes, to whom are given a premature monopoly of the markets." The protective rate of over 47 per cent. now prevails, and its reduction is resisted under the false pretense that protective rates are necessary to enable employers to pay the wages prevailing in this country, and this in the face of the well-established and historical fact that laws beyond the power of Congressional enactment control the price of labor. Mr. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury under President Polk, laid down the proposition that—

A protective tariff is a question regarding the enhancement of the profits of capital and not the augmentation of the wages of labor.

I do not hesitate to say that statistics show that more money is paid to the wage-worker in England for every pair of shoes he makes and for every yard of cotton goods he weaves than is paid for the same work in this country; and this fact no conscientious, well-informed man will dispute. And this statement will apply to the greater part of the other industries of this country. On pages 98 and 99 of the report of consuls in Europe on the cotton-goods trade of the world, November 12, 1881, Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State, in his letter transmitting the same, says:

Undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer hours of labor.

Further on he says:

It costs us no more to handle and manufacture the same than it costs in England.

The proposition that a high tariff makes high wages is an oft-exploded fallacy, but continually resorted to for the reason, as I believe, that it is the most specious sham in which hypocrisy, "the necessary burden of villainy," can hide its treacherous head.

The people have been cajoled with the promise that protective duties, or a high tariff would bring goods, merchandise, and implements down to the level of the price in other countries. In 1870 on this floor Mr. KELLEY said: "Keep your duties high enough to induce other men to build furnaces and rolling-mills and before five years you will find American iron cheapened to the level of the markets of the world, and that without a commensurate reduction of wages." Seventeen years of these high duties have been given instead of five, and iron is about twice as high here as in Europe, and the pig-iron lords, in the face of their false prophecies, now demand that these duties shall be made perpetual. Let me give another notable instance of the unreliability of the professions of a high tariff junto. In 1882 we were promised a reduction by the revision of the tariff of "not less on the average than 20 per cent." That revision has been the law since 1883, and the rate was then 42 and it is now over 47 per cent. Deception has been uncovered and falsehood exposed by the flight of time, but the robbery of the people goes on, and the rapacity of the mill owners is unsatisfied.

HOW IT WORKS FOR IRON-ORE COMPANIES.

The men and boys employed by the iron-ore producing companies in this country in 1880, by their labor alone, enhanced the net value of the output for that year on an average of $554 to the hand. Each was paid $300 as his wages, and the $254, the balance of his earnings, went into the profit account of the proprietors. The protective tariff was 40 per cent.

IRON AND STEEL MAKERS.

The hands employed by the iron and steel makers in the same year, by their labor alone, enhanced the net value of the output $746 per hand. Each hand received $393 as his part of the $746 he had earned, while the mill-owners took $353 for their part. Labor earns $746 and gets $393. Capital takes the rest. The tariff for the protection of this industry is at the rate of 48 per cent. Under the pretense of protecting labor the farmers are taxed 48 per cent., or must pay 148 cents for 100 cents' worth of steel, while the mill-owners take the earnings from the laborer at the muzzles of Winchester rifles in the hands of Pinkerton detectives and other armed retainers, vassals, and henchmen, who are constantly on guard under the false pretense of preserving order and protecting the property of the factory lords.

BOOT AND SHOE INDUSTRY.

In the boot and shoe industry in the same year the hands employed enhanced the value of the product by their labor alone on an average of $572 each, and each hand received of his earnings $387, while the manufacturer took $185 as profit from each. Protection, 30 per cent.

CARPET INDUSTRY.

Here we have a protective tariff of 75 per cent. The hands employed earned for their employers, by the additional value their labor gave to the commodity produced, an average of $640 per hand, but they were paid only $342 each, and a profit of $298 carried to the account of capital.

COTTON INDUSTRY.

Protected by a tariff of 45 per cent., their hands enhanced the value of their goods, by labor alone, an average of $520 per hand, but each received $245; the factory lord takes $275 for his part of the earnings.

FELT-GOODS INDUSTRY.

Here we have a duty of 40 per cent. for protection. Each hand employed enhances the value of the product $700, and receives for his earnings but $290, while capital takes $410.

WORSTED GOODS INDUSTRY.

The worsted-goods industry is protected by a tariff of 60 per cent. Each hand employed enhanced the value of the product on an average of $640, of which he received in wages $312, the mill-owner taking $318.

WOOL INDUSTRIES.

Protected by a duty of about 50 per cent., the hands by their labor alone enhance the value of the product an average per hand of $680; each receives $350, while capital gets of his earnings $330.

In these estimates I have taken the general average for 1880, and feel confident the computations are substantially correct. If errors exist they are unintentional.

And so through the whole list we find the pretense that the tariff is for the benefit of the wage-worker, a sham and cruel mockery. Under the unselfish pretense of benefiting labor the producers and consumers are alike robbed to enrich the selfish capitalist.

A careful study of a table that I find on page 251 of the first annual report of the Commissioner of Labor, and which I now adopt as a part of my remarks, will disclose the inequalities of the burdens, in every instance being a discrimination against the poor who use the cheaper goods. It discloses also the enormity of the burden of the tariff tax.

This table states the description of the goods, their width in inches, and the weight per yard of each kind; the price of the goods at the factory; the rate and the amount of duty per pound and ad valorem, and the total amount of duty levied under the compound rate; and also the per cent. which the total duty is of the price per yard at the factory in England.

Some time ago the Chicago Tribune, in answer to an inquiry made by a farmer as to how much tribute was demanded under the tariff law by the factory owners, made the following reply:

The cold facts may give our granger reader a chill colder than does the frosty weather, unless, perchance, his indignation should warm him up. We will classify a few of the items of the expenditure of an Illinois farmer's family, with the amount per cent. of tax it pays either to the Government on the articles imported or to the manufacturer, if produced in the Eastern States:

These rates simply mean that by law the people are compelled to pay our home manufacturers, if they choose to exact so much, an average of 147 cents for each article worth 100 cents in the markets of the world—$147 for each $100 worth of goods—and the law forbids the people to buy elsewhere, unless they do so at a greater loss. By this means our

This table is well worthy of careful study. In examining the figures given in the column headed "Price at factory" and the column headed "Per cent. of price at factory," which the total duty amounts to, the startling inequalities in the rate of duty to be paid in this country becomes apparent. The highest-priced goods named in the table is West of England broadcloth, worth $3.60 per yard in Leeds, the specific duty being 35 cents per pound and the ad valorem duty 40 per cent., making a total of duty of 50.3 per cent. on the value at the factory. This is on a high grade of goods. In looking at the bottom of the table the last entry is for cotton-warp reversible cloth, made in imitation of a better kind. It is worth but 45 cents per yard at the factory. The specific duty is the same as on the West of England broadcloth, 35 cents per pound, the ad valorem duty is 35 per cent., but the specific duty and the ad valorem duty together make the rate on the price at the factory 180.7 per cent. That is to say, the cheaper the goods at the factory the greater is the proportional increment of duty. The column headed "Per cent. of price at factory," which shows the percentage that the duty is of the factory price, brings this out clearly.

manufacturers have by law a home market, in which they yearly sell from six to seven billions of dollars' worth of goods. The distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BURROWS, estimates the annual production of the factories at $7,000,000,000, and of the farms at $3,727,218,994. The tariff law compels the people of the United States to buy their goods of these home manufacturers at any price less than 47 per cent. more than they are worth, at the pleasure of the manufacturer, and thus the home market is furnished for the $7,000,000,000 worth of goods.

But does the law compel the manufacturers to buy all the farmer's produce at any price over its value in England? No; but it compels him to sell to them his products at what they are worth in free-trade England, less the freight off. The price of what the farmer sells to the manufacturer is fixed in Liverpool, deducting freights, while the price of what the manufacturer sells to the farmer is fixed in Liverpool with 47 per cent. tariff added. The robbery is practiced both ways. We have had protection for twenty-six years, but the farmers have had no home market. During the last ten years they have sold in foreign markets $5,800,000,000 worth of produce. What would they have done without this foreign market? The statement that protection affords a home market to the farmer is a monstrous and unmitigated assumption.

That the farmers and day-laborers in the agricultural States have suffered the ravages of an unjust taxation by which they have been impoverished can be demonstrated by comparing their condition with that of the manufacturers. Since the protective element entered into tariff legislation in 1861 the American farmers have sold in the European market breadstuffs, provisions, and cotton to the amount of over $10,500,000,000. Since 1861 this enormous sum in gold has been brought from the Old World to the New as the sum of the foreign marketings of our agriculturists, and for which there were no home markets for them.

Where is the money now? Where is this British gold? Let us see. Massachusetts has now in her savings-banks $317,097,499. What has Illinois to show for her part? Mortgages on her farms to the amount of $410,000,000, mostly held in the manufacturing States. Massachusetts does not raise enough on her farms to feed her people. Behold the contrast! Maine has in her savings-banks $38,319,643, while Kansas has on her farms mortgages to the amount of $125,000,000, mostly held by people in the nine manufacturing States. Connecticut has over $102,000,000 in her savings-banks, while Indiana farms are mortgaged for $286,500,000, mostly to people in New England. The manufacturing State of New York has in her savings-banks $482,500,000, while the farms of the agricultural State of Iowa are mortgaged for $225,500,000. The manufacturing State of Rhode Island has in her savings-banks $53,285,000; the farms of Missouri are mortgaged for $168,500,000. The manufacturing State of Pennsylvania has in her savings-banks $42,220,000, while Minnesota is mortgaged for $122,500,000. The manufacturing State of New Hampshire has in her savings-banks $50,822,000, and the agricultural State of Michigan has farm mortgages to the amount of $129,229,553. The manufacturing State of New Jersey has savings-banks deposits in the sum of $27,500,000, while the agricultural State of Wisconsin has farm mortgages to the amount of $175,000,000. Vermont, a manufacturing State, has in her savings-banks $15,587,000, while Ohio has farm mortgages to the amount of $350,000,000.

These nine great agricultural States sent a very large portion of the produce to Europe which brought to agriculturists of America since 1861 $10,500,000,000 of British gold. The nine manufacturing States sent no part of it; but see now the situation. It is not a theory, but a condition, indeed, which affords the absolute proof of the rapacity with which the farmers are plundered. In estimating the amount of farm mortgages I adopt the mean between the lowest estimate, made for a leading Chicago bank, and the estimate first published some months ago. Where do the people of the manufacturing States get all this money? They do not dig it out of the ground as the farmers do. It comes from the home market, which they demand shall be protected for them alone, and the farmers and their families constitute that home market, from which they reap the golden harvest. The people of the nine manufacturing States have in savings accumulated a surplus above their wants of $1,129,331,142. The people of the nine great agricultural States named, instead of a surplus, have a deficiency to the extent of $1,992,200,000, for which they have mortgaged their farms.

Again, I say, behold the results of protection! In proportion as you increase the tariff, manufacturers grow rich; in proportion also to this rate do the farmers grow poor. In proportion to the increase of the tariff, the millions increase in the savings banks of the manufacturing States, and the mortgages increase on the farms of the great West. The interest charge is annually added as an additional weight to the already overburdened farmer, but the heavier it bears on him the greater it swells the account in the savings bank in New England. How much longer will the farmers and day laborers stand such exaction? In view of this condition of things, we are not surprised to hear the Chicago Tribune, one of the great Republican papers of the Northwest, saying: "The man who should rob the farmer on the high-road of his pocket-book is not a whit more guilty than these monopolists and steel barons who are levying toll upon him for every plow he uses to satisfy their extortionate greed and rapacity."

I am indebted to the St. Louis Republican for the following forcible statement, showing the effect of our protective tariff upon an agricultural as against a manufacturing State:

ILLINOIS AND MASSACHUSETTS.

Illinois is a farming State, the richest and most productive one in the Union. Massachusetts is a manufacturing State, one of the most wealthy and prosperous in the industrial group of nine States that are the seat of the protected vocations and the chief beneficiaries of the high-tariff policy.

The fertile soil of Illinois, its enormous crops of grain and other farm produce, its admirable railroad systems—the largest possessed by any Sate in the Union—and the intelligence and thrifty habits of its people make it the true representative agricultural State of the West; and in like manner, the intelligence and superior ingenuity of the Massachusetts people, their judiciously diversified industries, their thriving manufacturing towns, and their great wealth make it the proper representative of the industrial group. Illinois has an area of 56,650 square miles; Massachusetts, 8,310. At the last census Illinois had a population of 3,077,000; Massachusetts, 1,783,000. Illinois is more than six times as large in area as Massachusetts, and has nearly twice as great a population.

In 1880 Illinois had 255,741 farms, 436,371 persons engaged in farming pursuits, and $1,175,000,000 capital invested in agriculture, this being the estimated value of the farms, with the buildings, live-stock, and implements on them. Massachusetts had 14,352 manufacturing establishments with $303,808,000 invested in them, and employing 352,200 persons. It will be observed that Illinois has nearly four times as much capital invested in farming as Massachusetts has invested in manufacturing, and also that it has 84,000 more persons employed on farms than Massachusetts has employed in factories.

The value of all farm products in Illinois, both sold and consumed on the farms, in 1880 was $294,000,000, while the value of all the products of manufacture in Massachusetts was $631,000,000, from which must be deducted the value of the raw materials used, $387,000,000, leaving $244,000,000 as the net product. It appears, then, that Massachusetts, with one-fourth as much capital as Illinois, and 84,000 fewer persons employed, made $40,000,000 more in manufacturing than Illinois made in farming.

Again, it takes $1,175,000,000 capital invested in farming in Illinois to produce $204,000,000 worth of produce, but in Massachusetts $303,000,000 invested in manufacturing produces $244,000,000.

It appears, also, that it takes 436,371 persons engaged in farming in Illinois to produce $204,000,000 worth of crops, but in Massachusetts 352,200 persons engaged in manufacturing produce $244,000,000 worth of goods. In Illinois the average product per capita in farming is $442; in Massachusetts the average product per capita in manufacturing is nearly $700.

The assessed valuation of taxable property in Illinois for 1887 was $798,000,000, which, for a population of 3,077,000, is about $266 per capita. The assessed valuation in Massachusetts for 1887 was $2,100,000,000, which, for a population of 1,783,000, is about $1,120. So that not only is there more than twice as much assessed valuation in the small manufacturing State of Massachusetts as in the large farming State of Illinois, but an average person in Massachusetts is worth more than four times as much as an average person in Illinois.

These estimates are based on the assumption that all the wealth in Illinois is owned by its people. But it is notorious that this is not the case. All the railroads and telegraph lines are owned outside the State—in the industrial States of the East—and are assessed at $70,000,000, but actually worth $300,000,000.

And now, Mr. Chairman, let me pursue this comparison a little further. Official figures, as I find them in the Almanac for 1888, by the Librarian of Congress, show the actual assessed value of the real and personal property of all the States to be $22,954,630,201, divided between the manufacturing and the other States as follows:

Nine manufacturing States	$10,137,612,665
Twenty-nine other States	12,817,017,586

That is to say, the 15,000,000 people in the nine manufacturing States own nearly as much of the assessed value of all the States together as is owned by the 45,000,000 of people who live in the twenty-nine agricultural States.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1887 shows that the individual deposits for 1887 in the national banks were greater in the nine manufacturing States than in all the other States and Territories. Again, the published statistics of the savings-banks deposits for last year show that the nine manufacturing States had over $1,220,000,000 more money in these banks than all the other States and Territories had in similar institutions. It is a well-known fact that very nearly all the outstanding United States bonds are owned in the manufacturing States. It is also true that while the railroads in the agricultural States are assessed as a part of the wealth of those States, they are in fact owned and controlled by people in the nine manufacturing States. I therefore make bold to say that the 15,000,000 of people in the nine manufacturing States own to-day much more than one-half of all the wealth in this entire country.

This was not the condition of affairs here before the enactment of the protective tariff. Why should 45,000,000 people, all white, serve 15,000,000?

It has been stated to me as an admitted fact that a distinguished citizen of the manufacturing State of Pennsylvania holds ten thousand mortgages of an average amount of $500 each on ten thousand Kansas farms.

Ten thousand Kansas farmers and their families, constituting about 50,000 people, are working twelve hours a day to earn above their necessities the sum of $500,000 annually as the measure of their tribute to their good master. I can not blame the money-lender, but I do denounce and execrate the law that placed the galling yoke of slavery on the necks of these 50,000 white men, women, and children of Kansas. [Applause.]

I have remarked the inexpressible indignation of the distinguished gentlemen from that State on this floor when they even think of the negro slavery of the Southern States of long ago, and I now invite them to join this side of the House to repeal the law that has practically made their constituents, men, women, and children, slaves to a Pennsylvania master. A tariff for protection is indeed a piece of finesse to persuade men into slavery. I have been taught that the interests of the few should be subservient to the interests of the many. But a tariff for protection has brought about a condition in which the millions own nothing and the few own millions. Millionaires are in "purple and fine linen," while the millions are in fluttering rags. This is the result of protection.

Restlessness among the masses is manifest as another result of this wicked system. In six years we have had 3,903 strikes among that great and intelligent mass known as the wage-workers. These strikes are nothing more nor less than oppressed laborers revolting against the exaction of merciless capital. It is revolution against the order of tyranny, and it reveals to my mind the terrible truth that the industrial system of the United States, as organized under the protective policy, controlling steam, electricity, machinery, and labor in its heartless selfishness, is daily making a sacrifice of human beings to capital.

The bill under consideration is a mild assault on this system of taxation. It proposes to so modify the law as to reduce the revenue to be raised under it about $54,000,000. If it had no other effect than to relieve the people annually of the burden of paying $54,000,000 unnecessarily into the Treasury, it would be a boon of great value, and every Republican on this floor would join us and pass the bill in an hour.

But there is a much greater boon for the people in this bill than a relief to the extent of $54,000,000, and this other boon to the people is the $4 that the mill-owners and factory lords will lose for every dollar that will be lost to the Treasury. "Ay, there's the rub" to our Republican friends and their allies on this side of the House. The bill means a relief to the weary tax-payers of $270,000,000 annually, of which amount the Treasury would lose $54,000,000. Factory lords would lose $216,000,000. It is to save this last item to the mill-owners and iron-masters of the nine manufacturing States that this struggle is made. This is the true reason of the opposition. Mr. Chairman, I have always been opposed to the protection system. I believe with Judge Thomas Cooley, who, in his "Principles of Constitutional Law," says:

Constitutionally, a tax can have no other basis than the raising of revenue for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful. A tax on imports, therefore (a tariff tax), the purpose of which is not to raise revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular import for the benefit of some home manufacturer, may well be questioned as being merely colorable, and therefore not warranted by constitutional principles.

As a matter of common justice, I am opposed to protecting one class of our people at the expense of all the others. I am opposed to protecting by tariff taxation our manufacturing interests, which are now the most perfect and most powerful in the whole world, representing a machinery force of a thousand million men. This force can take care of itself. It ought to do so independent of artificial help.

Our soil is free, our thought is free, our speech is free, our farmers and wage-workers ought to be freed from the further disastrous exactions of unnecessary and unjust tariff taxation.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass, and I further hope that every member of Congress who votes against it for the purpose of continuing the enormous bounties to manufacturing monopolies at the risk of a great financial panic will meet, as he deserves, a political death and be buried under the ballots of November below the resurrection line. [Great applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. S. B. WEST.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8596) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Beeton, deceased, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. There is objection to considering it without having the report read.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. The Court of Claims found the man to have been loyal all through the war.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report read.

The report was read.

Mr. KERR. Is the finding of the Court of Claims here?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERR. Let it be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the finding of the court, but before he had completed the reading, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, under the order, took a recess until 8 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. was called to order by Mr. CARUTH, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. ARTHUR G. CARUTH, of Kentucky, to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. PIDCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Calendar be called in its order, and that, unless requested by some gentleman present interested in the bill, each bill as it is reached be passed over, to retain its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MCRAE. I do not want to object, but it seems to me that the request ought to be modified a little. I think it would be better that each member present should be recognized to call up a bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Invalid Pensions unanimously decided to ask that the Calendar be taken up in the order suggested by the gentleman from New York, and we believe that the business of the committee will be expedited by that method and proceed much more satisfactorily than under the plan suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MCRAE. Of course that would be entirely satisfactory to gentlemen who have five or six bills in the early part of the Calendar, and which will enable them to get them up, but very unsatisfactory to those who will not be reached at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I want to understand the proposition. Is it whenever a bill is reached on the Calendar and no person asks its consideration, that it is to be passed over?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be passed over simply by the reading of the title of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Unless its consideration is asked by some one?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes; and if not considered, it will retain its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this practice obtained during the close of the last Congress, and it was found after a trial for some evenings to give reasonable satisfaction.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to gentlemen that of course it will be necessary to pay close attention to the Calendar, as the bills will only be read by their number and title.

ABBIE R. BROWN.

The first business considered (called up by Mr. HERMANN) was the bill (H. R. 7642) granting a pension to Abbie R. Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abbie R. Brown, widow of John A. Brown, late a sergeant in the Fifth Battery, Maine Light Artillery.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The House committee of the Forty-ninth Congress favorably reported this bill, which report is as follows:

"Abbie R. Brown is the widow of John A. Brown, late a sergeant of the Fifth Battery, Maine Light Artillery. He died July 19, 1880, leaving a pending claim for pension based on rheumatism, which was completed by his widow. The immediate cause of his death was pneumonia, followed by acute phthisis. Widow's claim was rejected on the ground that disease of which he died was not incident to the service. Numerous affidavits have been filed with this committee, in addition to the evidence filed in the Pension Office.

"Abner O. Shaw, M. D., of Portland, Me., a physician of twenty-four years' standing, states under oath—

"'That the said John A. Brown, deceased, husband of this applicant, was treated by me professionally at various times from on or about the 15th day of July, A. D. 1865, up to the time of his death in July, A. D. 1880, except a time subsequent to about the 28th day of January, A. D. 1880, at which time the said John A. Brown went to Florida for his health, returning from there to Portland a short time before his death.

"'That during the period from about July 15, 1865, to about January 25, 1880, my treatment of said John A. Brown was for rheumatism and intercostal neuralgia, which rendered him for weeks together, and sometimes for months together, unfit to attend to any business whatever. That the visit of said Brown to Florida was for the purpose and in the hope that the climate might be beneficial to his health, as he was declining in health all the time. But no good result was attained by this, and Brown returned to Portland, his condition in no way improved from what it was when he went away.

"'I saw Mr. Brown very soon after his return to Portland, and at once perceived that he had not improved in his general health, and that he was suffering from a slight cold, said to have been, and I have no doubt was, contracted on his journey home from Florida. So slight was this cold that to a man in ordinary health it would have been a matter of but little moment, but in the case of Sergeant Brown, weakened by long sickness, and with but slight powers of resistance in consequence, it resulted in pneumonia, followed by acute phthisis, which latter was the immediate cause of his death.

"'My judgment of the case of said John A. Brown, founded upon my long treatment of him as his professional attendant, is that when he left the service of the United States he was suffering from malarial poisoning, the most prominent feature of which was rheumatism and intercostal neuralgia; that he was failing all the time, and after his return from Florida, as aforesaid, if he had not have taken cold, as I have stated, must soon have died by reason of the said malarial poisoning, contracted in the service of the United States, and for which he was pensioned; that the accident of taking cold only hastened the event of his death by a short time, which, in my judgment, was certain from his said malarial poisoning.'"

As the committee of the Forty-ninth Congress suggested, this case involves a plain principle under which Congress almost invariably grants relief. It is certainly evident that the soldier was on the verge of death from diseases contracted in the Army, and it is almost equally certain that the enfeebled condition of the system rendered him liable to the fatal attack.

Your committee report the bill back favorably, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES F. WARD.

The next business on the Calendar (called up by Mr. HERMANN) was the bill (H. R. 6520) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Ward.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles F. Ward, formerly of the ship Vermont, United States Navy, a pension of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R 6520) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Ward, report as follows:

The claimant under this bill was pensioned by the Department at $12 per month for injury to back. Subsequently he made a claim for increase on the ground of increased disability, and filed strong medical testimony on this point, including a certificate from the board of surgeons of Portland, Me., who say unqualifiedly that in their opinion the increased disabilities are directly traceable to the original injury. The medical officers of the Government did not accept this view and rejected the claim.

Soldier applied to the Forty-ninth Congress for an increase to $50 per month, but the bill was amended making it $24, and as amended the bill became a law. The present bill again asks for $50, and additional medical evidence is filed showing that claimant is now utterly unable to perform manual labor.

As this soldier is clearly disabled to the extent that the general law allows $30 per month for, your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "fifty," in the fifth line, and inserting instead thereof the word "thirty," and as so amended recommend its passage.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MERCY KNIGHT.

The next business on the Calendar considered (called up by Mr. DINGLEY) was the bill (H. R. 2413) granting a pension to Mrs. Mercy Knight.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mercy Knight, dependent step-mother of Lendall Wright, deceased, late a private in Company D, Fifteenth Regiment of Maine Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

This case simply involves the principle, so often recognized by Congress, of pensioning a dependent step-mother when it is clearly shown that she took charge of the child at a tender age and cared for him as a good mother should.

It appears that Lendall Knight was a private in Company D, Fifteenth Maine Volunteers, and that he contracted diseases in the Army from which he died almost immediately upon his return from service. It was conclusively shown that his parents were largely dependent upon him for support, and that he sent them considerable sums of money during the period of his Army service. Upon his death his father, Moody Knight, was pensioned as dependent parent, and when he died his step-mother, Mercy Knight, made application to have the pension continued to her, but this was refused on the ground that she was not the natural mother of soldier. It is certain that soldier knew no mother but claimant, and that she was a devoted parent to the boy.

It is equally clear that she is now utterly destitute and broken in health, and while this committee can not recommend the payment of the pension from the date of the husband's death, which claimant petitions for, they do feel that her name should be placed on the pension-roll, and accordingly report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

COL. JESSE H. STRICKLAND.

The next business on the Calendar considered (called up by Mr. GALLINGER and also by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana) was the bill (S. 381) for the relief of Col. Jesse H. Strickland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse H. Strickland, formerly colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, and that he be allowed a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "volunteers," in line 5, and insert thereafter the words "and for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, and for no other purpose, said Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of said regiment, to date from the 30th day of January, 1863."

The CHAIRMAN. The report accompanying this bill is quite lengthy and was read at the last meeting of the committee. The Chair is informed that the report has been read twice before.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I want to move that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TAULBEE. If I caught the reading of that bill aright I desire to raise the question of order upon it. I will examine the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. While I am not here to interfere with the rights of any man who is entitled to a pension or entitled to be mustered, I wish to say that this man has been before the War Claims Committee for relief once, which was denied him. He was before the committee in the last Congress on a similar bill to this. I want to say that I helped to organize the regiment to which he refers, and that he never was in the service a day in that regiment in his life.

Mr. BUTLER. Why?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Because he was not there.

Mr. BUTLER. Because he was sick in bed, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to interrupt the gentleman long enough to say that I insist upon the point of order upon the bill, and do not want to lose that right by entering upon the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order now.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that the point of order, if one is made, should be first stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the observation of the gentleman from New Hampshire is eminently correct.

Mr. TAULBEE. What is that?

The CHAIRMAN. That the point of order should be stated and passed on by the Chair, and it may be by the committee, before the discussion of the merits of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. What is the point of order?

Mr. TAULBEE. That this bill is not in order under the special order of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. That was settled before.

Mr. TAULBEE. It was settled that the bill was not in order.

I desire in connection with the suggestion of the point of order I shall offer to have read the order under which these Friday evening sessions are held.

The CHAIRMAN. The order will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until further ordered, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., the House shall take a recess until 7.30 p. m., and after the 15th day of April next until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar granting pensions, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on the Judiciary removing political disabilities, shall be considered, and no other business shall be transacted at such evening sessions, and the House shall adjourn on each of such evenings not later than 10.30 p. m.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, this is a Senate bill. The original bill reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse H. Strickland, formerly colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

In the Senate the bill was amended so as to strike out the last clause which I have read, "and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month," and insert the following:

And for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, and for no other purpose, said Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of said regiment, to date from the 30th day of January, 1863.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me an interruption?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that the bill was so amended in the Senate. That amendment is one reported by the House committee. The Senate passed the bill pensioning the claimant at $30 a month.

Mr. TAULBEE. I stand corrected. But it is immaterial for the purpose of this point of order as to where this amendment originated, whether in the Senate or in the House, or whether incorporated in the original bill. In any event the bill now before the House is amended as I have indicated. The special order read by the Clerk provides that bills granting pensions reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills removing political disabilities reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, shall alone be considered. The order is very explicit in its terms, and says no other business shall be considered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman's point of order is directed not against the bill but the amendment. It can be raised against the amendment when proposed.

Mr. RYAN. The bill is not amended as yet.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point of order pertains to the bill as amended.

Mr. RYAN. But it is not amended.

Mr. TAULBEE. Now, Mr. Chairman, certainly my point of order relates to that part of the bill which proposes to correct the military record of the beneficiary of this bill. No point of order is correct as made against the original bill, because that is a bill granting a pension.

There seems to have been an effort on the part of the framers of this amendment to bring it within the special order; and that effort goes no further than to place this amendment before us under the avowal that it is for the purpose of enabling the beneficiary to prosecute a claim for pension and that only.

I have maintained that it is immaterial as to what the purpose of this amendment is so far as regards the point of order. The thing sought to be accomplished by this amendment is the correction of a military record. That is the unmistakable purpose of the bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I simply inquire whether the gentleman heard the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole say he was ready to rule on the point of order?

Mr. TAULBEE. I think I caught some such suggestion from the Chair. But I do not see that that has anything to do with my speech.

Now, I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions had no jurisdiction of the matter pertaining to the military record of this claimant. And even if it did have such jurisdiction, the fact that the House has recognized the report and placed it on the Calendar as coming from that committee can not affect the special order of the House which provides that only such business shall be considered on Friday evening as is indicated in the special order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was not the gentleman a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. While a member of that committee did he file a minority report against this identical amendment—this bill having been then before our committee?

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no recollection as to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was reported to the House by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-ninth Congress and placed on the Calendar with this identical amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not remember about this bill; but I know it was not customary with regard to bills involving only a rate of pension of $30 a month that members of the committee should make minority reports. But I think I am perfectly safe in saying that if this bill as now amended was before that committee I was opposed to the bill, whether my opposition resulted in filing a minority report or otherwise; because I do not think I have ever gone so far as to advocate the passage of a bill like this.

But I do not desire to enter on the discussion of the merits of this bill on the point of order. I have stated the point and am ready to submit it to the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Several MEMBERS. Decision.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside; not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made and it is the duty of the Chair to rule upon it before entertaining any request. This bill was presented at the last pension session of the Committee of the Whole, and the first impression of the Chair was that the point of order then made, which was of the nature of the point indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] to-night, was well taken, but, upon consultation with some very excellent parliamentarians, the Chair reversed its ruling and entertained the bill for consideration at that time. Still entertaining doubt as to whether or not this bill with the amendment was in order, the Chair has consulted the Speaker upon that question during the week, and the Chair supposes it is not out of order to say that the Speaker is of the opinion that this bill is in order under the special order providing for these Friday evening sessions. The Chair therefore, in harmony with the views of the Speaker, is compelled to overrule the point of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. The Speaker did not hear my speech. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has heard it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain this committee, and I shall not occupy five minutes. This bill has been once before the Committee on War Claims and rejected. It was rejected in the Forty-ninth Congress. Now, while I have no disposition to keep any man out of a pension who is entitled to it, I feel it to be my duty in behalf of the men who are entitled to pensions to make a statement of this case as it stands, so that the House may know just what it is.

The report of the committee proposes to muster this man now as a colonel, simply for the purpose of giving him a chance to be on the pension-rolls. In the first place, that regiment never was entitled to a colonel. Mr. Strickland and Colonel Capps, of Knoxville, started out to raise the regiment. Mr. Capps did most of the work and enlisted most of the men. At Camp Nelson, Kentucky, where the regiment was mustered, Mr. Capps was present with eight companies, which entitled the regiment to a lieutenant-colonel, and he was mustered as lieutenant-colonel. As I have said, the regiment never was entitled to a colonel. I joined that regiment and was mustered with the regiment as lieutenant of Company A.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Am I to understand the gentleman as saying that Mr. Strickland was mustered as lieutenant-colonel?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir. Colonel Capps was mustered as lieutenant-colonel.

I repeat, the regiment never was entitled to a colonel; it never had men enough; and if this bill is to pass its effect will be to have a man mustered as colonel of a regiment that never was entitled to have a colonel. Now Mr. Strickland claims that he was sick. I joined that regiment on the 1st of September and he was not with the regiment then. The regiment went from Kentucky to Knoxville and staid in East Tennessee until after the siege of Knoxville, and was then consolidated with another regiment. That entitled them to a colonel, and a man was mustered as colonel of the consolidated regiment.

Mr. GALLINGER. One further question. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] if Mr. Strickland was not commissioned to raise this regiment, and if he did not perform a large amount of work in finding men, refugees and others, and if he was not taken sick before the entire complement was completed. I ask the gentleman if that is not a matter of historical fact.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That may be very true.

Mr. GALLINGER. And has Mr. Strickland ever received one single cent of compensation for all the time and money and effort he expended in that way?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I suppose not; but there are thousands of other men in the North in the same condition, who started out to recruit regiments and never completed them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not men who were taken sick in the service of the Government, so as to be rendered unable to follow up the work.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, let me go a little further. That regiment staid in East Tennessee from the last of August or 1st of September until after the siege of Knoxville, and this gentleman never came near the regiment. He certainly was not sick from August until January.

Now, I want to call the attention of this committee to another fact. There is a man named Frank Strickland, who files an affidavit in this case, and who says that he was quartermaster of the regiment. He is a brother of this claimant and he is in the same condition; he never was with that regiment in his life.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are not discussing him now.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. He never was quartermaster of the regiment. The lieutenant of my company was the quartermaster and commissary from the time the regiment was mustered, and though this man claims to have been quartermaster he never was with the regiment. Neither of these Stricklands was ever with the regiment; yet here is one of them claiming the rank of colonel and the other swearing him through, though neither of them ever smelled gunpowder or was ever with that regiment at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was not this regiment largely made up of refugees, and was it not necessary for these men to scour practically a large portion of the State in order to get those troops?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir. There were 150 refugees recruited at Camp Morton, in Indiana. Thomas Capps came over there and recruited them, and out of those 150 men they formed Company A and half of another company.

When those men got back Strickland was not there. If he had been there and claimed his muster I suppose he would have got it. He said to me that he could have been mustered as lieutenant-colonel, but he would not take that. If he had been there and had been mustered as lieutenant-colonel, Mr. Capps would have been mustered as major; but Strickland was not there and Capps was mustered as lieutenant-colonel and served and received his pay as lieutenant-colonel, and the regiment had all the officers it was entitled to.

Mr. GALLINGER. But was not Mr. Strickland promised the colonelcy?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do you not think he was?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I suppose he was, provided there were enough men to make the regiment; but there are plenty of other men in the country that were promised colonelcies if they raised men enough, but they did not succeed in raising the men. Now, are you going back to muster them all in as colonels?

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the gentleman tell us how large a deficit there was in the regiment?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Four companies. There were two-thirds of a regiment, which entitled it to a lieutenant-colonel; and, as I have said, the regiment had all the officers it was entitled to.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I have no disposition to make a captious fight against this man, yet in justice to others who are entitled to pensions, I say that this man ought to go to the Military Committee and have his rights determined there, and not to a committee that has no such jurisdiction, and therefore I insist on my motion.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] a question. I happen to know these brothers Strickland. They happen to have been born in Philadelphia, the sons of a most distinguished man, sons of as high-toned a gentleman as ever lived anywhere, and I do not like to hear the gentleman from Indiana say that the companion of my youth, Francis Strickland, made an affidavit that was not true. Did I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir.

Several MEMBERS. You did.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. You did say that. You quoted him, and said that he had made an affidavit stating that he was quartermaster of the regiment, and then you said that he never was quartermaster.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I say he may have been quartermaster, but he never was with the regiment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; that may have been so. I do not know. I did not have the good fortune to be connected with the Army during the rebellion, but I suppose a man could be named as quartermaster of a regiment by the State authorities and could perform the duties of quartermaster, and yet it might be his misfortune never to be mustered in. But I say that if Francis Strickland stated in an affidavit that he was quartermaster of that regiment, he certainly was practically quartermaster, because I know he is a man who would not state a falsehood.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, what is your question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. My question was: Do you state that Francis Strickland made an affidavit stating that he was quartermaster of that regiment when in fact he was not quartermaster?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I state just what I stated before.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] will accept a suggestion. If Mr. Strickland was regimental quartermaster he no doubt could have been mustered in and yet not have been with the regiment; but the fact can be very easily ascertained by examining his military record at the War Department.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it happens that Mr. Francis Strickland is not on trial here. It is not his case that we have before us; but it rather grates upon me that a man who was brought up as a gentleman, and who is a gentleman to-day by birth, by instinct, and by conduct, should be charged with making a false statement, and stating that he was a quartermaster of a regiment, when in fact he was not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A good many men who were born gentlemen did not stay with their regiments during the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Chair——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I have not yielded the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] asked me a question, and I was going to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] to yield the floor. Does the gentleman insist on his right to the floor?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I was going to answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL]. He asked me if I said that this man never was quartermaster of the regiment. What I say is that he never performed the duties of quartermaster of that regiment, and never was with the regiment in his life. I will say, however, that my views are somewhat changed when I learn that these two gentlemen were born in Philadelphia, because I suppose that a gentleman who is born there can not do anything wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, this case comes before the House surrounded by prejudices, and I think by many prepossessions. I have no disposition to advocate any case before this committee or this House that, in my judgment, is not just and right. I have endeavored to investigate this matter, as I have endeavored to investigate every other coming before that committee, carefully and conscientiously, and my judgment is, Mr. Chairman, that this bill ought to pass.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported eight or ten cases during the present Congress—I do not know how many—of soldiers who were never mustered into the service; of men who enlisted and contracted disease between that time and the time of their muster. They reported the cases to the House, and the House generously passed bills for some of those men, and they are pensioners to-day on the generosity of the Government, which recognized the fact of their service to the country, although technically they were not regularly mustered in, but having contracted disease in the service, it was believed the Government owed to them a debt of gratitude if not of cash.

As to this man, I have examined some papers not before the House touching on this case. I find he was going down to raise a regiment in Tennessee at the time the Government needed troops there, and that regiment would necessarily have to be composed of refugees. He went out and spent days and months on duty under the promise that he was to be commissioned colonel of the regiment, when he was taken ill. He did not get any commission and he did not receive a dollar of compensation for the service he had rendered. He applied to have this title granted to him, but the War Department decided against him. It is not a breach of privacy of public affairs or of propriety for me to say that the man who made the decision against him is now a member of the United States Senate and voted the other day to pension this man at the rate of $30 per month, recognizing that while technically he could not receive the title, he had in all fairness done service for which the Government owed him compensation, and he proposed to pay it by giving him a pension at $30 per month.

I am not a military man; I know nothing about the technicality or etiquette of military life; I am not here to bandy words nor to split hairs in any technical discussion of this question, but I am here to say, looking at this as I look at all pension cases, dealing justly between man and man, and between citizens and the Government, it seems to me the relief which is proposed should be granted to this claimant. There is not the least doubt that the man rendered service and that he is entitled to some relief. It has been said, although I do not know the fact, that if this man had accepted the commission of lieutenant-colonel which was offered to him he would have been entitled to the same pension, but he declined to do so, insisting upon his right to the title of colonel of the regiment. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. PERKINS. Was the Committee on Invalid Pensions satisfied this claimant is suffering from the disease which he contracted while recruiting this regiment for the Government?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am modest when speaking about professional matters, but I say as an individual I am fully satisfied the bill would not have been reported by the committee unless that were the fact.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the judgment of the committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee were fully satisfied on that point, and that this action is necessary before the man can apply to the Pension Office. It is a unanimous report, and it seems to me we ought to pass the bill.

Mr. TAULBEE. I dislike to disagree with the gentleman who reported the bill as to what the bill undertakes to do. If I understood the gentleman before taking his seat he did not think this man ought to have a pension before he made an application to the Pension Office. Now, I undertake to say this bill gives him a pension before he has made any such application.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will simply reread the bill, which provides as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse H. Strickland, formerly colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

If this does not give this man a pension I do not know what it does. The amendment then provides:

And for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, and for no other purpose, said Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of said regiment, to date from the 30th day of January, 1863.

That is intended to cover the arrears.

Mr. GALLINGER. How can he get arrears before he files his pension in the Pension Office? The gentleman has had experience in the Pension Office——

Mr. TAULBEE. The report of the committee contains the following:

In the judgment of your committee the conclusions reached by the committee of the last Congress are eminently proper, and no good reasons are known to exist why claimant should not be required to establish his disability in the proper bureau of the Government after, by the aid of Congress, he has obtained a pensionable status under the general pension laws; and therefore return the bill, and likewise amend the same by striking out all after the word "volunteers," in line 5, and inserting thereafter the words "and for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, and for no other purpose, said Jesse H. Stricklan i shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of said regiment, to date from the 30th day of January, 1863," and thus amended ask its passage.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that amendment can mean anything, in the light which this report throws upon it, it certainly means this: that in the event of the limitation of the arrears of pension ever being removed by Congress, this man can have his pension granted from the date of the incurrence of the disability, which is September, 1863.

Mr. GALLINGER. Permit me to say that I entirely agree with the gentleman from Kentucky on that point.

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly; I know you do.

Mr. GALLINGER. And I know of no earthly reason why an exception should be made in the case of this man, if the Pension Office sees fit to grant him a pension.

Mr. TAULBEE. I think the report of the committee itself shows very conclusively the reason why he ought not to be brought within the operation of the general pension laws. In this report we find, upon ex parte testimony, upon the statement of the applicant himself, as shown by a former report, which is incorporated in this report now before us, that he does not show himself to be entitled to a pension at all. Now, if we are to go on raising recruits to put down rebellion, muster regiments, give rank to officers and grant pensions to them in the same bill, I think this is just about as good a bill as ever was brought before the House for the accomplishment of such a purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Whatever may be the opinion of the gentleman, presumably, at least, the Committee on Invalid Pensions is as honest and as honorable as the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. And that is not saying very much for the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is so; and probably the gentleman himself is the best judge of that point.

Mr. TAULBEE. I think the gentleman ought to adjust himself a little before he undertakes to cast reflections upon the personal motives of gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is just what the gentleman has been in the habit of doing for some time.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to promptly enter my dissent to that remark. I want to be entirely parliamentary in my statement when I say that there is not one word of truth in that statement. I make no reflections.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman has been pursuing that line to-night.

Mr. TAULBEE. I submit that I have not by word, deed, or intimation attempted to cast a single reflection upon a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so the gentleman from Kentucky is certainly very unfortunate in the choice of his language; and I think if he will examine his remarks in the RECORD to-morrow morning he will see that the suggestion is warranted.

Mr. TAULBEE. I shall not change a word of my remarks in the RECORD, and I think I know what I have said. Certainly I have not reflected upon the character of a single member of the House or been unparliamentary in anything I have said. I have made no reflection. My remarks shall stand just as they were delivered, and I shall not shrink from any responsibility in regard to anything that I have said.

But the fact of the matter is that the weakness of this bill brings gentlemen to the front as though they had a whole nest of yellow-jackets humming around their ears.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps that is not a reflection. But I care nothing for it. I stand before the committee and before this House as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and not ashamed of any act of mine in the committee-room or on the floor of the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have not called upon the gentleman to feel ashamed about anything he has done. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be smart——

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not trying the gentleman before the bar of his own conscience. I leave him to his own reflections. I shall not attempt to bandy words with him. It has nothing to do with the matter before the House.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAWYER. I wish to inquire whether it would not be as well for these personal matters to be discussed in a private room, and thus take them out of the House?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly. I think the gentleman from New York is entirely right. I do not think it is legitimate to bring in personal matters in the consideration of a bill like this. I am sure I have no reason to reflect upon the gentleman who has taken exception to some of my remarks. I wish to state that I do not intend and have not intended to reflect upon him or the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to know that fact; for I think, as I said before, the gentleman's language is rather unfortunate as expressing his real sentiments.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, I think my language is always fortunate. The only thing is, the gentleman does not hear it in the right spirit.

But, Mr. Chairman, I said before and I repeat that I think this is one of the most remarkable bills that I have ever seen reported to this House. I know it has been customary, and especially during the Forty-ninth Congress, to grant relief to persons who have never been mustered, but not such relief as this. I have in mind a bill that I introduced myself in that Congress where a man was regularly enlisted, but before the muster of his company he was shot in an engagement with Confederate soldiers and badly wounded; to such a degree, in fact, that he was not mustered at all because of the disability.

But though he never was mustered, he was given a pension finally on the disability incurred as a private soldier in the grade in which he was enlisted.

But this bill undertakes to do more than that. There is no evidence, so far as I have ascertained, where the report shows that this man was ever enlisted, or that he had any military status whatever; and from the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON], for whose integrity let me say by way of digression that I have the highest personal regard, and hope he will take no offense at what I say, I am led to the conclusion that the beneficiary under the bill never performed any military service of any kind. The gentleman from Indiana seems to have been one of the charter members of this regiment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman permit me again to interrupt him?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman from Indiana admitted that he knew Mr. Strickland performed service. When I asked him the question he said he had no doubt he had done so. Why, then, does the gentleman from Kentucky say he performed no services?

Mr. TAULBEE. I spoke of service in connection with the regiment, and I do not think I have misunderstood the gentleman from Indiana. That gentleman says when he first joined that regiment the beneficiary of this bill was not then with the regiment.

The facts as I glean them from the report seem to be about these: That Mr. Strickland was authorized to raise a regiment; that he went into Tennessee, and among the loyal men of Tennessee he succeeded with others in getting together about eight companies of men. But when the time came to organize the regiment and go into the active service of the United States, for reasons which are set forth in the declaration of the applicant and in the brief of his claim, on his own statement he was not mustered. Whether he attempted to be mustered as a private or lieutenant-colonel or colonel of that regiment I am unable to say.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit in all candor that this claim comes too late. The war has been over for too long a time for us to undertake to muster and equip regiments and officer them. There will be no end to the granting of pensions if at this late period in the history of the country we undertake to raise, equip, and officer regiments in the late war.

I do not believe I am chargeable with any prejudice against any man who is entitled to a pension; and I think the reflections of that nature offered by the gentleman who made this report do not apply to me. I do not take them as personal to myself. However much prejudice others may have against this bill or any other bill, I do not consider I am chargeable with it.

I say, whenever a disability was incurred by an enlisted man incidental to his service in the Army of the United States, no man will vote more quickly than I will to give him a pension. But when it comes to raising regiments and commissioning officers for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for a pension before the Bureau of Pensions, and especially when such broad latitude is given that in the event that the limitation of the arrears act is removed this man, who never performed a day's service in his life in the Army of the United States, so far as I know, who never subjected himself to the dangers of war, is to be made the beneficiary, not only as a private but as the colonel of his regiment, and in that event will be entitled to a pension from September, 1863—when such a claim is made I must certainly oppose it.

If any gentleman wants to say anything further about this bill I am ready now to yield to him. I do not want to cut off debate, but at the proper time I want to submit a motion.

Mr. BUTLER. This is no bill for the purpose of raising a regiment or equipping a regiment. That sort of clap-trap has nothing to do with the consideration of this case.

Mr. Strickland lived in Tennessee, and, as has been already said, his father's bones rest in the capitol of that State. He was so honored by the people of our State and was held in such high esteem that when the old man died the Legislature by an act provided that his bones should be interred in the capitol.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. He was architect of the capitol.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. His son lived at Nashville in the midst of treason and rebellion where it required some courage at that time to be a loyal man. He lived in a very hot-bed of treason. That man was loyal to his country. President Lincoln gave him permission to raise a regiment. He undertook the task, and in going around for that purpose spent the last dollar he had. While so engaged he was stricken down with disease, and after the regiment was raised he was not able to leave his room. Another person was mustered as colonel of the regiment that Mr. Strickland had raised for the most part, spending, as I have said, in doing so every dollar he could command in the world.

Mr. CONGER. While he was sick the other man was mustered.

Mr. BUTLER. While he was sick and on his back the other man was mustered colonel after Mr. Strickland had spent months of time and every dollar he had in recruiting and getting the refugees into that regiment.

But because, on account of his sickness, he could not go to the front, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] says he never saw him. It is remarkable, is it not, that the gentleman did not see him after he had raised that regiment, when he was away 250 miles off, on his back, racked with misery and rheumatism and pain. Can it be that he shall not have the status to get a pension because the gentleman from Indiana did not see him?

It is said that this claim comes too late. I say it is never too late to do justice to a loyal man, as Mr. Strickland was, in the midst of treason and rebellion. All he asks and all that this bill provides is that he may have such a status that he can go to the Commissioner of Pensions, and if he can prove his disabilities incurred while raising that regiment, and the continuation of the disabilities, he may be pensioned like any other man under such circumstances. This great hullabaloo that Mr. Strickland was not in the regiment and that the gentleman from Indiana never saw him with the regiment should not be allowed to interfere with justice being done to him.

If I may be permitted to do so, I may say that I myself knew him well. I know that he was a loyal man, and before the Federal Army approached our State I had to whisper to him in undertones for fear it might be found out what we were talking about. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] says that Mr. Strickland's case has been rejected. Suppose it has. If it was rejected, then it was wrongfully rejected; there was a great wrong done to this man, and this House ought to correct it and do him justice. He was loyal to his country; he did all he could for it; he spent his last dollar; and because he was overtaken with disease and stricken down so that he could not be mustered into the service and another man was mustered in his place are we to deprive him of his rightful status which would enable him to go to the Pension Bureau and obtain the pension that he is entitled to?

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman permit a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to know if it is not a fact that the colonel of this regiment, the man who was really mustered in as colonel, is now on the pension-roll?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know where Colonel Capps is or what became of him, though I knew him well. But that does not affect the case at all. This man was entitled to the muster if he had been able to be there.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which, as I do not write a very legible hand, I will read. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and to insert the following:

For the purpose of prosecuting a claim for pension, to date from the passage of this act, and for no other purpose, Jesse H. Strickland shall be considered as having been duly commissioned and mustered as colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers, from the 30th of January, 1863.

The bill as presented seems to me to put him on the pension-roll. My amendment takes the latter clause of the bill, which simply proposes to give him a status which will enable him to prosecute his claim for a pension. I move this as a substitute for the bill and the pending amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] if the 30th of January, 1863, is the date named in the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is. I have copied it from the bill. [Cries of "Vote!" Vote!"]

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I think I can say for the committee that they will accept that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a proper amendment, but as a representative of Philadelphia I want to say a word in relation to these two young men—for they were young men when I knew them—the Messrs. Strickland. I knew them both well many years ago——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I claim the right to be heard, having been recognized by the Chair, and I protest against the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] taking me off the floor in this way.

Mr. RANDALL. I never do that. I was not aware that the gentleman had been recognized; I have not my glasses with me this evening. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will do so if I can be recognized after him.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I thought I had the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to have yielded the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I did not yield except to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to say that I knew both these gentlemen as young men forty years ago, and I never yet heard anybody who knew them say anything against their high character. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. If you insist on voting now you will not pass this bill. If you are so anxious to vote as to be unwilling to hear a word in explanation of the position that some of us occupy on this bill, you can persist in that demand, and we will settle the fate of this bill very quickly.

A MEMBER. Of course you can defeat the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the object this bill aims at. I may say here that I did not know Mr. Strickland at all, nor his father, nor his grandfather, nor any of his sisters or his aunts, but I knew Colonel Strickland himself very well, and I know of his heroic struggles to raise this regiment and to serve his country loyally, and there is not any reasonable measure that might be proposed here for his benefit that I would not support and vote for; but in my judgment this bill contains legislation of a very doubtful character, and although I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] would make it very much better, I still doubt whether it would be effective for the purpose in view. I put it upon this ground: I doubt whether you can by this sort of legislation put a man into the Army of the United States, or give him any status, or accomplish anything for him that you do not accomplish by the bill itself.

I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], who opposes the whole of this bill, made a pretty good point when he said that it was an attempt to muster in, upon a pension bill, a colonel of a regiment. Now I do not think that can be done, nor do I believe that the War Department would recognize any man as having gotten into the Army in that sort of way. What is it that we are trying to do? We are trying to give this officer a pension. Why not do it, then? Why not say so in so many words?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it not a very common thing for Congress to rectify errors in mustering in?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; but here is a case where there was no muster at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I understand that Congress proposes by this bill to declare that this officer has the status that he would have had if he had been mustered in.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. This bill simply proposes that, for the purpose of prosecuting a pension claim, and for no other purpose, he shall have the status of a colonel.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Exactly; and that is the kind of thing that Congress is doing almost every day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, we may differ about that. My friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] may have his opinion, and I may have mine. Now, why not pass this bill as it came from the Senate, or add this to it if you please, "or upon a higher rate of pension, if the disability of this officer indicates it." We have the right to fix this pension.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the reason that the Committee on Invalid Pensions are not fully satisfied that this man ought to be pensioned. That is the reason they do not propose to pass the Senate bill. They want him to go to the Pension Office and establish the fact of a pensionable disability.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And to connect it back with his service in the Army?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then we are doing nothing for the officer at all.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the amendment of my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], it simply provides that Mr. Strickland shall prosecute his pension claim in the regular way, from the date of the passage of the bill, but puts upon him the burden of establishing by proof the fact of the incurrence of the disability in the line of duty.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I was willing to do a great deal better than that for him. I was willing to vote for a pension direct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the amendment seems to be in effect contradictory of the original bill. The more the Chair examines it the more peculiar the phraseology appears. The bill places this man upon the pension-roll, and then the amendment provides that "for the purpose of prosecuting a claim for a pension" he shall have a certain status. They are contradictory. The substitute, however, is decidedly more consistent, because it goes directly to the proposition and expresses the idea which the committee desired to express, whereas the bill provides that the man shall be pensioned, and then in the amendment provides that he shall not be pensioned, but shall simply have a right to prosecute his claim for a pension.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to consume time, but I had prepared an amendment substantially the same as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], except that my amendment contains the usual provision that this claimant shall establish his claim subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws. I do not think that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] contains that provision, and if that amendment be adopted there may be a little ambiguity as to how this claimant is to establish his claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, was again read.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not say he shall do that in conformity to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That would necessarily follow. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the vote shall be first taken on the amendment of the committee, and then on reporting the bill to the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman has accepted that amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to submit a motion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman accepts my amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. He can not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. TAULBEE. I will move at the proper time to report to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question next recurs on the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. If that amendment be voted down, will the question then recur on reporting the bill to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question will recur on reporting the bill to the House if no other amendment is moved.

The substitute moved by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question next recurs on the motion to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That is my motion; that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to ask a question in reference to this bill. Is it not a fact ——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent to the gentleman proceeding?

Mr. TAULBEE. Is it not a fact that this claimant has another bill pending before the House, in which he claims payment for expenses incurred in recruiting this regiment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to say, if the question is propounded to him, that he has no information on the subject.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is no parliamentary question.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, to report the bill with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TAULBEE demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 39.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No quorum. I am willing to withdraw the point of no quorum if we can have an understanding that a vote shall be taken on this bill in a full House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the bill being reported back to the House, with the understanding that the previous question shall be considered as ordered and the bill go over to be voted on in a full House?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Say next Monday.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have to object to that on account of its interference with the revenue bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It will not interfere with it very long. I propose by unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal on next Monday this bill when reported to the House shall be taken up and voted on in a full House.

Mr. TAULBEE. Is no time to be allowed for debate?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. As the point of no quorum has been made the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If to-morrow be fixed as the time when the vote is to be taken on this bill, I will not object.

Mr. PERKINS. Why not make it Friday next, which is private-bill day?

Mr. TAULBEE. I feel bound to object to that. I will not object to its being voted on to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. Why not let the bill be reported back to the House with the understanding that it shall be voted on in a full House. It will be voted on some time during the session. It is bound to be reached.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to that.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I insist on the point of no quorum, and shall do so unless I can get some compromise on this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my colleague to fix some time further off—say the fourth Monday of May.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum having been withdrawn, the House having voted on a division, 12 in the affirmative and 39 in the negative, the motion to report the bill with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed is disagreed to.

The question is on reporting the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CARLTON. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order that no quorum had voted, and I am not aware that it has yet been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not know the gentleman had made the point.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me make this suggestion. I do not wish to appear factious in regard to this matter, and if the committee will fix any time within the next six weeks, or say four weeks from next Monday, when a vote may be taken in the House on the bill, the previous question ordered, and fifteen minutes' debate on each side, I shall make no objection.

Mr. CARLTON. I have no objection to this going to the House and taking its legitimate place upon the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the Chair understand to be the suggestion of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I make this suggestion: That on four weeks from next Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the vote shall be taken on this bill after fifteen minutes' debate on each side, it being understood that it goes over with the previous question ordered upon its passage.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think that is a fair suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement in connection with a bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What bill?

Mr. O'FERRALL. One of the pending pension bills.

Mr. SPOONER. I think we had better proceed in the regular order.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to make a statement that will not occupy more than a minute. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. SPOONER. I object.

JAMES L. ALSIP.

The next business on the Private Calendar considered (called up by Mr. HUNTER) was the bill (H. R. 6575) for the relief of James L. Alsip.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to all limitations and provisions of the pension laws of the United States, the name of James L. Alsip, late of Company A, Third Regiment Kentucky Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

James L. Alsip enlisted in Company A, Thirteenth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry, and was honorably mustered out on the 10th day of January, 1865. The papers on file in the Pension Office show that the injury for which he made application for pension resulted as follows, as stated under oath by the soldier:

"The regiment being on a march from Burksville to Columbia, Ky., I was suffering with a bowel trouble known to the soldiers as camp dysentery, and the weather being very cold and inclement, late in the day, by order of the captain, in company with Edmund Edwards, I started to the house of a private citizen to stay over night. While on the way to the house my horse slipped and fell on the ice on the turnpike road, throwing me with great force upon the back of my head on the frozen macadamized road, rendering me insensible for a short time and indenting the skull on the back part and near the top.

"After I recovered sufficiently from the shock from the fall we went on to the private house and remained until next morning, when I returned to the regiment until I was mustered out with the rest of the regiment. But during the time I remained in the service after I was injured I continued to grow worse, and at the time I was discharged I was in such bad condition that I was barely able to travel to my home, and continued to gradually grow worse until in July, 1871, when I became entirely helpless in my lower limbs."

Edmund Edwards, who was with the soldier at the time of the alleged injuries, makes affidavit as follows:

"James L. Alslip and I belonged to the same company and regiment. I never knew him to be diseased until about the latter part of the winter of 1864. While we were encamped at Columbia, Ky., James L. Alslip was taken with disease and was permitted by his captain to be taken to a private house for a few days. I was detailed to go with him. The ground had ice on it, and Alslip's horse fell with him, striking Alslip's head against the rock on the pike, cutting his head on the back part very bad. I tied up the wound with my handkerchief and took him on to the private house. After he returned to the command I heard him complaining frequently as long as we were in the service."

Peter H. Sadmons, who enlisted in the same company at the same time and served with him until mustered out, says he knew him to be a sound, hearty boy and man prior to his enlistment, and was free from any paralysis of lower limbs in any degree. He says:

"In January, 1864, the said Alslip was away from the company on some duty and when he returned to the regiment and company he complained of a hurt that he received while away by reason of his horse falling and pitching him on the ground or pike, and falling on the back of his head, and that he seemed to suffer with the same for some time."

The examining surgeon in his report says he found on the side of soldier's head, about 2 inches back of the left ear, a depression about 1 inch in diameter and one-half inch in depth. He says:

"From the character of this depression I have no doubt but that it had been produced by violence from a fall or blow of some kind, and it undoubtedly produced compression upon the brain."

He further says:

"His arms are partially paralyzed and the muscles of the arms are slowly atrophying or perishing away; his spine has slight curvature in the dorsal region. His thighs and legs are completely paralyzed and the muscles on them have entirely perished away, leaving nothing but skin and bone. The muscles of the bottoms of his feet are contracted, drawing the toes down into the bottoms of his feet. He can not walk or stand on his feet."

All the evidence in this case goes to show quite conclusively, in the opinion of the committee, that the injury received as detailed herein was the cause of the paralyzation of the soldier's limbs. The evidence shows that at the time the accident occurred he was absent from his regiment and company by permission of his superior officer, and therefore was in line of duty.

The case, it seems to the committee, is one that appeals to the generosity of Congress, and so believing we submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my request that I may be permitted to make a brief statement in connection with a pension bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I must object. This is not the proper way to expedite the business of pension bills on the Private Calendar; and I do not think we ought to depart from the rule we have been pursuing.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I have reference to the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Minor Hoxey, daughter of John Minor Botts, of Virginia, who was known North and South as a Union man, and this lady is the widow of a New Jersey soldier, Maj. Benjamin W. Hoxey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island objects.

JOHN WITHAM.

The next business considered (called up by Mr. HUNTER) was the bill (H. R. 6845) granting a pension to John Witham.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to all the limitations, restrictions, and provisions of the pension laws of the United States, the name of John Witham, late a member of Company C, Thirteenth Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6845) granting a pension to John Witham, have had the same under consideration, and find that John Witham entered the service of the United States October 15, 1861, and served in Company G, Twelfth Regiment Volunteers, up to January 15, 1863, when he was discharged for disability. That he again entered the service in Company C, Thirteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry on the 10th September, 1863, and served until discharged, July 10, 1865. That on the 3d or 4th of July, 1864, at Bakertown, in the State of Kentucky, and while engaged in cooking his meal, a drunken soldier, without cause or provocation on the part of Witham, shot and dangerously wounded said Witham near the groin, from which wound he has never recovered.

That he applied for a pension, which was rejected upon the ground that the wound was not received in line of duty. He is now almost helpless, has no means to live on, is old, unable to work, and is being supported by the charity of friends.

Your committee is of opinion that this is a meritorious case, and recommend that the bill pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MILTON JUDD.

The next business considered (called up by Mr. HUNTER) was the bill (H. R. 3712) increasing the pension of Milton Judd.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Milton Judd, a pensioner of the United States, a soldier in the late civil war in Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, be, and he is hereby, allowed a pension at the rate of $45 per month, in lieu of $36 per month as now allowed, and that the Secretary of the Interior be requested and directed to place the name of said Judd on the roll of pensions and paid at above rate.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3712) increasing the pension of Milton Judd, have had the same under consideration, and now submit the following report:

Milton Judd was a private soldier in Company B, Thirteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and is now receiving a pension of $36 per month, and this bill asks that the same be increased to $45 per month.

During the war of 1861 he was, as appears from the papers on file, while engaged in action in the battle of Resaca, in the State of Georgia, on or about the 14th day of May, 1864, wounded by a gunshot in the right arm between the elbow and shoulder-joint, necessitating the removal of about 6 inches of the bone between the elbow and shoulder.

The arm is shortened to the extent of 5½ inches; there has been no formation of bone in place of that removed; the muscles of the shoulder and arm are very much perished and reduced; in fact, the arm and hand are entirely helpless. The stump of bone remaining at shoulder-joint is only 1½ inches long—too short to adjust an artificial arm if arm were amputated. The carrying of the limb has produced drooping of shoulders and slight curvature of spine. He would, if his arm had been amputated, be entitled under the law to $45 per month; and as his arm is entirely useless he is in really a worse condition than if he had no arm at all.

Dr. U. L. Taylor makes affidavit as follows:

"I have known him (Milton Judd) for about sixteen years, and have during a great part of this time been his family physician. I have frequently examined his injured arm, and have to-day given it a very full and free examination, and find the condition as follows: A large part of the bone of the right arm is taken away, leaving the whole remaining part a hanging, dangling, perishing mass. It is perfectly useless and terribly in the way. The arm is shortened by loss of bone between shoulder and elbow 6½ inches; the circumference of the whole arm is very much less; from wounding of the nerves of the arm it is at times very painful.

"If the arm had been amputated a stump would have been useful, at least in developing the muscles of the breast, shoulder, and back, and preventing the shrinking that is so well marked. The disability of this man is very much more than it would be if his arm were off 'at or about the elbow,' because the arm is continually in the way. In everything that he undertakes he has to watch that arm and protect it."

J. G. Taylor, M. D., a practitioner since 1846, says: "I have known Mr. Milton Judd about three years; have examined him carefully several times, and I fully indorse the statements made by Dr. U. L. Taylor."

The soldier is a very poor man, and has a family of eight children. The testimony of his comrades and neighbors is to the effect that he was a splendid soldier and is a most excellent citizen.

The committee are fully convinced that this is a most meritorious case, and that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY O'NEILL.

The next business considered (called up by Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts) was the bill (H. R. 3745) granting a pension to Mary O'Neill.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary O'Neill, sister of Thomas C. O'Neill, late captain of Company E, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3745) granting a pension to Mary O'Neill, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary O'Neil, or O'Neill, is the sister of Capt. Thomas O'Neil, who was killed at the battle of Cold Harbor, June 4, 1864. His mother was pensioned March 17, 1865, and drew pension until her death on March 27, 1875, when all payments of pensions on account of the death of said soldier ceased.

The claimant is not entitled to pension under the general law as a dependent sister, because she is over sixteen years of age, but she has been for many years, in fact from childhood, and is now, hopelessly insane and under the care of a guardian. Captain O'Neil was one of five brothers who served in the Union Army during the late war, and it was upon him that the mother as well as this unfortunate sister were dependent. The fact is not only shown by the evidence on file in the mother's case, but also by the affidavits of competent and reliable persons accompanying the guardian's petition for the relief sought at the hands of Congress.

In like cases Congress has granted relief to the unfortunate relatives of deceased soldiers who by reason of age or otherwise have no longer title to the bounty of the Government, and believing this case to be equally meritorious your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, as follows: Strike out the word "O'Neill" wherever the same appears in the title and the body of the bill, and insert therein instead the word "O'Neil;" also after the word "Volunteers," in line 7, the following words, "and pay to her legally constituted guardian the sum of $ 8 per month."

Amend the bill so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mary O'Neil."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH BURR.

The next business considered (called up by Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR) was the bill (H. R. 488) granting a pension to Elizabeth Burr.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Burr, widow of William Burr, late of Company F, One Hundred and seventy-second Regiment of Ohio National Guards.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

Two things may have had something to do with the rejection of this claim—the fact that he only served from May to September, and the fact that his claim would carry arrears. The claim was rejected, however, on the ground that the disease of dropsy, with which he died, existed prior to enlistment, and the only evidence of this is said to be an admission of the claimant. She simply admits, as does her father, that her husband had swelled feet three or four years before his enlistment, but denies that he ever had swelled feet any other time until after his discharge from the service. Lydia Burnsworth testifies that claimant once told her that he had swelled feet at some other time, but claimant denies this, and avers that she had not spoken to her for five years on account of some existing enmity.

In all this bundle of papers this is the only competent evidence that any such disability existed prior to enlistment, and against this is the sworn testimony of fourteen of his neighbors and comrades, whose characters are shown to be beyond question, that prior to his enlistment he was a strong, healthy, and able-bodied man, and a good worker. And the evidence all shows that from the time he became sick in the service, and from the time of his discharge to his death, he was never able to do any heavy work or any considerable amount of labor. There is no question that he died of dropsy, and there is no satisfactory evidence of its existence prior to his enlistment, the only symptom relied upon by the special examiner being a doubtful one, and this having been shown to exist only once, and then so long prior to enlistment that we do not feel that the claim ought to be rejected on this ground, and hence recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DOLLY BLAZER.

The next business considered (called up by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was the bill (H. R. 3959) granting a pension to Dolly Blazer.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Dolly Blazer, widow of Richard Blazer, deceased, late captain of Company B of the Ninety-first Regiment of Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3959) granting a pension to Dolly Blazer, having considered the same, report as follows:

The beneficiary of this bill is the widow of Richard Blazer, who was captain of Company A of the Ninety-first Regiment of Ohio Volunteers in the military service of the United States, and who was well known to the country as the intrepid commander of the famous Blazer Scouts, who waged such deadly warfare with Mosby's men in the valley of the Shenandoah and in the mountains of Virginia. She is now fifty-three years of age. Six of the children born to her and said soldier were under sixteen years of age at the time of the soldier's death, and two of them are still under that age.

The soldier died at Gallipolis, Ohio, on the 29th day of October, 1878. His widow applied for a pension under the general law and fully established her claim in every respect, except as to the cause of the soldier's death. She alleged that the cause of his death was rheumatism and disease of the kidneys, and proved conclusively that he contracted these diseases in the line of his duty in the military service of the United States, and suffered with them constantly to the day of his death, but the Pension Office found the immediate cause of his death to be yellow fever, and rejected her claim upon the ground that the disease was contracted after his discharge from the service.

The evidence as to the cause of death is conflicting, but your committee, after careful and painstaking consideration thereof, are of the opinion that the weight of the evidence is with the claimant, and shows that the death was caused by disease of the kidneys contracted as alleged, and not by yellow fever, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out the words "Company B" where they occur in the bill, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Company A."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIZZIE WRIGHT OWEN.

The next business considered (called up by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lizzie Wright Owen, only surviving daughter of George Wright, late a brigadier-general of United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for information, if that bill proposes to grant a pension of $50 a month or any sum in excess of $30 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill proposes to grant a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

Mr. CHEADLE. Is it to a widow?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CHEADLE. Then I shall object to its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if there is to be objection to the consideration of the bill it should be made now, as the report is quite a lengthy one and would occupy a considerable time in reading.

Mr. CHEADLE. I make the objection now.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire to ask my friend from Indiana whether he objects to the further consideration of the bill because he is of the opinion that it is not a meritorious bill?

Mr. CHEADLE. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. HERMANN. Because I can assure the gentleman that it is.

Mr. TAULBEE. If necessary, I will object on that ground.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to the consideration of the bill without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. HERMANN. With the understanding that the bill shall retain its place on the Calendar, I ask that it be allowed to go over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. There was no objection.

CHARLES F. ALLGOWER.

The next bill (called up by Mr. COOPER) was the bill (S. 334) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Allgower.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles F. Allgower, late captain of Company I, Seventy-seventh United States Colored Troops, at the rate of $72 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read in part.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that the report in full be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 334) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Allgower, having considered the same, report it back and recommend its passage, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 137, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 334) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Allgower, have examined the same, and report:

"It appears by the records in the case of Charles F. Allgower that he entered the service of the United States as a private of Company C of the Sixth Regiment New York Volunteers; that during such service he lost his left arm by a cannon shot, necessitating its amputation near the shoulder-joint; that by reason of such injury he was mustered out of service, and so remained until his arm had time to heal; that thereupon he re-entered the service and became captain of Company I, Seventy-seventh Regiment United States Colored Troops; that while on such duty he was transferred to the staff of General T. W. Sherman, then commanding the eastern district of Louisiana, as inspector of artillery and ordnance officer; that while in the discharge of that duty he suffered a collision with other horsemen, in which he was thrown from and underneath his horse, rendering him senseless, and from which resulted partial paralysis of both legs and of the remaining arm, deafness in the right ear, and mental disorders consequent upon concussion of the brain. Added to these infirmities is the loss of an eye, which occurred as a special dispensation, and is not chargeable to his military service.

"It is in evidence from successive boards of medical examiners, as well as from private and unofficial physicians, that his injuries have rendered him practically helpless, requiring the services of an attendant in nearly every process and function of life—in dressing and in walking, in lying down and rising up, and in eating as well as in the final disposition of his food. This evidence is continuous, and is strengthened in its cumulative effect by the attempted technical impeachment by a pension agent, who, finding that the captain had walked the length of a block in a city, and, under inspiring conditions of strength and weather, had covered a larger space in the country, reported him—with an eye and an arm gone, with tottering legs, and a reeling brain—as partially disabled.

"Your committee think proper to embody in this report the following letter from Captain Allgower's commander, who was equally noted for his bravery, his discipline, and his justice:

"'HEADQUARTERS THIRD ARTILLERY, FORT ADAMS, R. I.,
"'October 17, 1866.

"'DEAR SIR: Yours of the 15th instant is received. I am very glad to hear from you again, and that you are being well cared for.

"'It gives me pleasure to state that you served faithfully on my staff, as inspector of artillery and ordnance officer, from March, 1864, until you became totally disabled from a fall with your horse in the year 1865. I will always bear witness to your zeal and devotion to duty, and your sincere desire (and success) to always promptly meet the views and wishes of your commander in the line of your duty. Your knowledge, too, of ordnance and artillery, and all subjects connected therewith, was far above the general run of that of volunteer artillery officers.

"'You deserve much credit, besides, in striving to the performance of arduous service after you had lost an arm in battle in the cause of your country.

"'Your misfortune, in accidentally being thrown with your horse when in the performance of your duty, and thus totally disabling you, was seriously felt by me, as I had no officer in my command who could properly replace you.

"'Hoping that you will continue to improve in your health, and that you will receive the reward of your country for your important services, I am, very respectfully,

"'Your obedient servant,

"'T. W. SHERMAN, B. M. G., U. S. A.,
"'Colonel Third Artillery, late Commander
"'Eastern District, Louisiana.

"'CHARLES F. ALLGOWER, Esq.,
"'Late Captain Seventy-seventh Colored Infantry,
"'St. Luke's Hospital, New York City.'

"In this case there is a mass of papers which should suffice to define the status of a regiment covering a score of years; comprising statements from nearly a score of doctors, and many scores of acquaintances and attendants, and all establishing by testimony the facts hereinbefore detailed.

"Your committee believe that Captain Allgower has earned in service and suffering the increase of pension for which he asks; and the bill for such increase is therefore reported favorably, and with a recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REUBEN BROWNMILLER.

The next bill called up for consideration (by Mr. COOPER) was the bill (S. 333) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Reuben Brownmiller, father of Jeremiah Brownmiller, late a private in Company H, Forty-eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read in part.

Mr. WEBER. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. TAULBEE. There are one or two things which can be ascertained more briefly perhaps from a statement than from the reading of the report.

Mr. WEBER. This is the case of the dependent father.

Mr. TAULBEE. Was the son killed in the service?

Mr. COOPER. He was stationed at the custom-house in Galveston, Tex. Some parties had a quarrel, and while on duty the soldier was killed. The only question is whether he was strictly in the line of duty.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill S. 333, having considered the same, report it back and recommend its passage, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 139, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 333) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller, have examined the same, and report:

"The claimant is the father of Jerry Brownmiller, who was a private in Company H, Forty-eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He is indigent, is now seventy-six years of age, and is unable to work.

"He had five sons, all of whom served in the Union Army. Two of these sons certainly died in the service, and probably three so died, for one of them was reported as missing and has never since been heard from. As to the two survivors, one was discharged for disability which has ever since partially continued. The other was sick a great deal while in the service, and was wounded in the leg in battle.

"This indigent old man, in his claim for a pension, states all the above facts, and was required by the Pension Bureau to elect upon which son he would base his just demand upon his country for a pension. He chose Jerry.

"Jerry was murdered February 1, 1866, at Galveston, Tex. Postley, the murderer, was tried by a court-martial and was found guilty. The records of this case in the Pension Office contain a transcript of the testimony before this court-martial. Postley had assaulted one Hays, and was "jerking him about pretty rough," when Brownmiller stepped up and told him not to handle Hays so roughly. Postley told Brownmiller to stand back, and drew his revolver. Brownmiller said he would not stand back. Some scuffling ensued, when one Carr told Brownmiller to stop or else Postley might shoot him. Brownmiller then stopped. Postley then threw Hays on the ground and then raised up and shot Brownmiller, who was about ten feet distant, in the head above the left eye. He died in fifteen minutes thereafter. Brownmiller was on duty guarding the custom-house at Galveston, and the murder was committed in front of the tent which was appurtenant to the custom-house.

"The Pension Bureau disallowed the claim, holding that 'the soldier's death was not due to disability incurred while in the line of duty, but resulted from an affray with another soldier.'

"It is the opinion of this committee that the above conclusion is erroneous, for the following reasons:

"1. Brownmiller was not when shot engaged in any affray, but had desisted from his attempt to keep the peace, had stepped back, and was a mere looker-on during all the time from when he stepped back until the murderer had thrown down the person whom he was assaulting, and then shot the deceased.

"2. Even if Brownmiller was engaged in this affray, he was a guard at the custom-house, and it was plainly his duty to quell this disturbance.

"In view of these facts, it would seem that this case is strictly within the scope of even the general law; and considering the fact that the claimant lost certainly one, and probably two, other sons absolutely by reason of their service for their country, and that the health of two more was impaired, one being wounded, your committee are of the opinion that a father who sent five sons to the war and sacrificed so much should be recognized by the country, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GUARDIAN OF ENOS J. SEARLES.

The next bill (called up by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was the bill (S. 738) granting a pension to the guardian of Enos J. Searles, of Clermont County, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Enos J. Searles, of Clermont County, Ohio, late private Company L, Fifth Ohio Cavalry.

The bill was reported with the following amendment:

Add, after the words "Fifth Ohio Cavalry," "and pay to his legally-constituted guardian for him a pension of $18 per month."

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read in part.

Mr. ROMEIS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let us have that report read.

The reading of the report was concluded. In full it is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 738) granting a pension to guardian of Enos J. Searles, having considered the same, report it back, and recommend its passage with the following amendment, to wit: Add, after the words "Fifth Ohio Cavalry," the words "and pay to his legally-constituted guardian for him a pension of $18 per month."

Your committee adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 148, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 738) granting a pension to guardian of Enos J. Searles, have examined the same, and report:

"That the claimant was a private in Company L, Fifth Ohio Cavalry, and served from November 14, 1861, to November 14, 1864, being discharged at last-named date by reason of expiry of term of service. His wife testifies that he became insane July, 1864, while in the service, and that after his return home he continued to act strangely, and she and her children lived in fear of him until 1872, when he was pronounced insane and taken to the asylum. He remained in the asylum several months, returned home as improved, but in 1874 was again returned to the asylum, where he has ever since been, and now is reported by the officers at that institution as suffering from mania, probably incurable; as quarrelsome and dangerous, especially in the night.

"The evidence of Wyatt, Rader, and Donham shows that before his army service and up to about August, 1864, he was a healthy, jovial, cheerful man—a useful and brave soldier.

"Maj. G. H. Rader testifies that in July, 1863, the claimant, near Cartersville, Ga., was sent out on a foraging expedition, which was suddenly surrounded and attacked by the enemy. He escaped by swimming the Etowah River, from which he took cold and fever, and these, with the fright and excitement, affected his mind, so that he never appeared to have a sound mind afterwards, even while in the service. This is substantiated by the oaths of his comrades, Donham and Cundiff, in same company. We do not think this evidence overcome by the fact shown that some of his maternal relatives were occasionally insane or subject to insanity.

"He may have been laboring under a hereditary taint, and might have become insane without military service, but this 'may' and 'might' are conjectural. The fact is that he became insane while in the service; that the attack is shown to have been superinduced by a very hazardous flight and exposure in a special expedition upon which he was ordered. That the disease did not assume a dangerous type for several years after is nothing against the circumstances detailed of how it originated. It began in the service in one form; it is sometimes a long time incubating.

"The bill is recommended to be passed."

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to know if the soldier is dead?

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is for the benefit of the soldier himself.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. CLARISSA G. GREEN.

The next bill called up for consideration (by Mr. WEBER) was the bill (H. R. 8266) for the relief of Mrs. Clarissa G. Green.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Clarissa G. Green, dependent mother of James F. Green, late of Company D, One hundred and twenty-ninth New York Volunteer Infantry, afterward the Eighth New York Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read in part. In full it is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8266) for the relief of Clarissa G. Green, submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in this bill is now a woman seventy-three years of age, of the very highest personal character, and belongs to one of the most respectable families in Niagara County, New York.

She has buried her entire family, except one daughter, a worthy woman, but in ordinary pecuniary circumstances.

The widow and mother has unfortunately lost all her property and has no personal means of support, and is dependent upon her daughter and the kindness of friends.

Her only sons entered the service, and both are now dead, one dying from the effects of his service, for which his widow is pensioned, the other dying as herein stated. The circumstances under which her son, James F. Green, on whose account she now asks a pension, lost his life, are fully set forth in the accompanying letter, affidavit and certificate. The high character of these parties is certified to by Mr. WEBER, the member of this House who introduced the bill, and in whose district the parties live.

"MIDDLEPORT, N. Y., February 25, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: Allow us the pleasure of introducing to you, as the bearer of this, Mrs. Emma C. Root, a sister of our old friend and comrade, William G. Green, now deceased, who was a member of Company F, Twenty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers, afterwards the Eighth New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers, the same company and regiment of which we were members.

"During the month of February, 1863, while we were garrisoned at Fort Federal Hill, Baltimore, Md., it had become almost a universal custom amongst the enlisted men of the regiment, when a sufficient number of regular passes could not be obtained, to take or substitute for a regular an irregular pass, skip over the parapet when the sentinel's back was turned—which perhaps in many instances was purposely turned, the sentinel remembering past favors and desiring the continuance of the same when relieved from duty—go down street, attend the theater or other places of amusement, and come back to the fort to answer to their names at roll-call.

"Well, you know how it was yourself, colonel, before you were promoted and when you had no shoulder-straps to enable you to pass the guards. On one of these occasions, when James F. had 'been down town,' as the boys called it, and had returned, and was inside the fort and on his way to his quarters, a guard, having the technical right, and possessing more zeal, or something else, than sense, shot him dead, for no greater offense upon the part of young Green than his failure to respond to the usual challenge of the guard, which 'the boys' resorted to or not according to the proximity of 'an officer.'

"We have been thus explicit, colonel, that you may be enabled to see the exact situation of this case, and thus perhaps be enabled to assist in righting a wrong of long standing; for although, through the unfortunate circumstances related, appearances in official reports may appear differently, James F. Green was as true and loyal a soldier as ever wore the blue; was young, scarcely more than twenty years of age, full of life and enthusiasm, was generous to a fault, and beloved and respected by all his comrades.

"James F. Green's mother, an old and feeble lady, in very reduced circumstances, is still living, who, after giving two sons—all she had—a sacrifice upon her country's altar, receives no pension or other consideration at the hands of the Government. We ask you to take an interest in the case, etc.

"Very respectfully,

"JAMES COMPTON.
"FERNANDO HINCHEY.
"GEO. E. SMITH.

"Col. JOHN B. WEBER, M. C."

"MIDDLEPORT, N. Y., February 25, 1888.

"This may certify that I was first lieutenant of Company D, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, in February of 1863. That I was officer of the guard at Fort Federal Hill the day that James F. Green was shot. I further certify that I have heard the inclosed letter, dated February 25, 1888, to Col. John B. Weber, and signed by James Compton, Fernando Hinchey, and Geo. E. Smith, read, and that the statements therein contained relative to the death of said Green are true of my own knowledge.

"W. B. GARDNER.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of February, 1888.

"L. S. FREEMAN, Notary Public."

Upon the above was the following certificate:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 8, 1888.

"The facts set forth in the inclosed letter were well known to me, and I most heartily indorse the application.

"D. L. PITCHER,

"Late Captain Company M, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery."

Subsequently Col. P. A. Porter, commander of said regiment, the son of a distinguished general of the war of 1812, and himself losing his life while gallantly leading his regiment at the battle of Cold Harbor, wrote the following letter to the father of the soldier relative to his death:

"HEADQUARTERS EIGHTH REGIMENT NEW YORK ARTILLERY,
Baltimore, March 1, 1863.

"MY DEAR SIR: I inclose the furlough for your son William, which I was unable to procure last night, although I waited some time at General Schenck's headquarters.

"I beg that you and your family will be assured of the heartfelt sympathy of myself and the whole regiment in the grievous affliction which has fallen upon you.

"I have thought often and often of the poor mother during the last few days. I pray that God may give her strength to bear so great a sorrow. I wish to say, too, that nothing could have been more considerate or have shown greater fortitude than your conduct in such trying circumstances.

"I remain, truly, yours,

"P. A. PORTER,

"Colonel, Commanding Eighth Regiment New York Volunteers.

"HIRAM GREEN, Esq."

The records show the soldier to have been a member of Company C, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery.

The mother's application was rejected at the Pension Office solely on the ground that the soldier's death "was not chargeable to the service in the line of duty."

Your committee believe, from the evidence furnished them, that this is a very meritorious case, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass, especially as precedents for this action may be found in the past action of this committee and Congress.

Mr. BAKER, of New York (interrupting the reading). I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with, and that the report in full be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. TAULBEE. I must object to dispensing with the reading.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky will not insist on his objection if a brief statement is made in explanation.

Mr. WEBER. This is a very simple case, free from complications. The precise point in question is well defined. It is the case of a dependent mother.

It is not denied that the son died in the service. Dependence has been established. It is not claimed that the boy died while strictly in the line of duty.

The widowed mother is seventy-three years old, feeble, tottering on the verge of the grave. Her two sons enlisted in the service as privates. This boy was shot by a camp-guard at Baltimore while within our lines, in a garrison far from the enemy's lines.

The boy had been down town; had run the guard, as had been done in numerous cases. I presume many of us would be compelled to plead guilty of such petty infractions of the rules if we had to testify. On his return when he was on his way to his quarters and inside the fort a guard shot him dead.

His mother, as I have said, had two sons. Both enlisted in the service. The other son died three or four months ago. The Government is the beneficiary to the extent of the difference between the pension claimed by the soldier for the loss of his arm and the pension now paid to his widow. Those are substantially the facts.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman will pardon me, the point was as to the killing of the son, on whose account the pension is proposed to be granted. I did not catch the gentleman's statement with reference to that point.

Mr. WEBER. He was killed by a camp guard, far from the enemy. The killing was simply the act of a fanatic, although strictly within the technical rules of the service, and the regiment universally regretted the melancholy occurrence, as is stated in the report in a very pleasant letter from the colonel of the regiment, who testifies to the high character of the boy.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA A. HICKS.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8260) granting a pension to Lydia A. Hicks.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place upon the pension-rolls of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lydia A. Hicks, the widow of John Hicks, late a private in Company I, Sixty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, as this report is somewhat long, perhaps it would be just as well if I were to make a statement with regard to this case. I had a personal acquaintance with all the parties, and I have personal knowledge of the facts. The husband entered the service, and it appears by the evidence of his comrades that he was taken sick and returned home. He made application for a pension and the application was rejected because he did not furnish sufficient evidence, or rather it was not rejected, but simply dropped. The man was the very essence of poverty, and his widow is a woman who is entirely blind. The man had not sufficient health or strength or money to prosecute his claim in the usual way, and he died without its ever having been passed upon. The widow made application for a pension later, but it failed for the same reason.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What was the reason?

Mr. SAWYER. The reason was that the man did not have strength to make the necessary effort; he did not have either the strength or the money.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is, he was so weak that he had not strength enough to make the necessary affidavits?

Mr. SAWYER. No, sir; he made the affidavit and it was sustained by the testimony of two comrades who were in the same company with him.

By unanimous consent the reading of the report was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 8260, submit the following report:

That it appears from the report of the Adjutant-General, on file in the Pension Office, that John Hicks, the husband of the beneficiary named in the above bill, was mustered as a private in Company I, Sixty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, February 27, 1865, and remained with his company until he was mustered out and honorably discharged with his company, July 17, 1865.

It further appears that there are no hospital records of this regiment on file in the office of the Surgeon-General.

John Hicks made an application for a pension. In his application he made his claim on the ground of chronic diarrhea and kidney disease, and states as follows as to the incurrence of disease:

"In July, 1865, on a march from Bakersville to Danville, Va., lasting over four days, I was exposed to a drenching rain every night and became soaked, which exposure brought on an illness and fever which left me in the diseased condition named, with chronic diarrhea and kidney disease."

He further stated that he had attacks of the chronic diarrhea every year since then; that during those attacks he was wholly unable to labor; that his back was always weak from his kidney difficulty, and that whenever he caught cold his urine would be bloody, and that he was troubled with the chronic diarrhea and kidney difficulties at intervals all the time after he left the army.

On his examination before board of examining surgeons they failed to find any disability, and the claimant, being a very poor man, dropped his claim, and the same was rejected.

Mrs. Hicks was married to John Hicks in 1857, and they lived together, except while he was in the Army, until his death, August 30, 1884.

The evidence shows that John Hicks was a very poor man, and that his widow is now and for years has been blind; that she is entirely without means of support, being supported by the charity of her friends and partly in the county poor-house of the county where she resides; that she has no children except one son, Frederick B. Hicks, born April 2, 1872.

She made an application for a pension, but the same was rejected because she was unable to furnish the evidence required by the bureau showing her husband's death to be the result of his service.

Quite a number of affidavits have been filed with the committee which in their opinion show the claim of this poor, blind widow to be meritorious.

Joseph Bordwell, in his affidavit of February 13, 1888, states:

"I was acquainted with John Hicks; we were both recruits—joined the regiment together, and bunked together for a time. I remember well that he was a hearty, strong man and apparently in good health until some time in the spring of 1865, when on the march from City Point to Danville, Va., he was taken sick with army dysentery and fell out of the ranks. It was reported he was sent to hospital; at any rate I do not recollect of seeing him again."

William G. Hunt, in his affidavit, of date of November 9, 1887, states that he belonged to the same company with the soldier and became acquainted with him when he joined that company.

"He was uncommonly healthy, robust, and rugged. He was a recruit when he joined us. I was sick of diarrhea. He used to carry my baggage and his own, too, upon the march, he was so strong. To my best recollection, in June or July, although it may have been earlier, he was sent to hospital, I think regimental, and never returned to us. Previous to this for some time he had suffered from a disease of his throat and a chronic diarrhea. He complained of being sick, and looked pale and weak. I think he complained of the trouble in his throat and pain in his back."

The affiant further states that he saw Hicks about six months after his discharge, and saw him frequently up to the time of his death; that he was never able to do regular manual labor; was laid up fully half the time; that his principal trouble was the diarrhea, pain in his spine, neck, and head; that his constitution seemed to be broken down and unable to endure exertion.

The evidence clearly shows that the soldier was a man of excellent habits, and a good, industrious citizen when able to work. He used to express his regrets at his inability properly to support his family.

Mrs. Evelina A. Hibbard, in her affidavit, states that she had known the soldier for about twenty-four years prior to his death; that when he entered the military service he was a frequent visitor at affiant's home, and was a strong, rugged, healthy man, able to and did do regular daily farm work. She states that she saw him very soon after he came back from the Army; he was pale, thin, and sick; that he said he had had chronic diarrhea; that he was a very poor man, and had to work when he was not able; that he was sick a good deal; that he worked for her family before he went to the war and again after he came home, but he was not able to work steady nor at hard work. She heard him every little while complain of the chronic diarrhea, from his discharge to his death.

Mrs. Rheuhamel A. Corbin, in her affidavit, states she had known soldier since 1850:

"Prior to his entering said service he was a healthy, able-bodied man; he worked for me some, and I knew him to be tough and rugged. He was brought to my house on his way home after his discharge in a hack, and was not able to sit up much of the time during the few days he was at my house. I nursed him; he had a diarrhea; was very poor and pale; his complexion was very sallow; complained of much pain in his neck and back; he was dizzy, had spells of blindness before his eyes; his breath was very short; his chest was very sore; had some trouble in spine, so that his back was weak and sensitive. I made liniments, poultices, and medicines for him, and took the best care I could for the time he was there."

She describes the continuance of the diarrhea and spells of dizziness and pain in his head and back, and his continued inability to work.

Dr. Dolley, a physician of high standing, in his affidavit states that he had known soldier since 1860, and "knew him as a healthy, able-bodied man;" that—

"From about the time of his discharge and return home from the Army I furnished medicines for him and to his wife for him at intervals. I distinctly remember that part of such medicines were for a diarrhea, and I think some for kidney disease. I might have given some for other troubles of his, but the diarrhea is firmly fixed in my memory. His wife was blind, they were poor, and I never made any data or charges for these treatments, and I am unable to specify except from general recollection."

It appears from the affidavit of George Addison, who was working with the soldier the day he died, that that day he was working drawing oats, he working on the load; that he was not feeling well that day, and only came to help out; that he was favored in his work, he doing none of the pitching. At noon he complained of pain in his neck and back, between his shoulders and head, and of feeling sick at his stomach. He looked pale and ate but little. During the afternoon he rested several times. In the evening, just as they were finishing up the work, while he was standing on the wagon, he turned partly around and fell sideways to the ground; he breathed a number of times; did not speak, and very soon died. Dr. Tompkins came, examined the body, and said the neck was not broken. No inquest was held.

Other affidavits of a similar nature to that quoted were filed with the committee, and they feel entirely justified, in view of all the evidence, to say that it is reasonable to suppose that the death of soldier was the result of disabilities incurred in the service, and that if there is any doubt the poor, blind widow is entitled to the benefit of them, and therefore they recommend that the bill do pass. The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN GEIBEL.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 824) granting a pension to John Geibel, reported adversely by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill, which is reported adversely to the House, will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. KERR. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa demand the reading of the bill and report?

Mr. KERR. I would like to hear the name of the soldier again.

The Clerk again read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

CASPAR SEIBEL.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3922) to place the name of Caspar Seibel on the pension-roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Casper Seibel, late of Company G, Fourth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

On motion of Mr. TAULBEE, the further reading of the report was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3922) to place the name of Caspar Seibel on the pension-roll, have had the same under consideration, and now submit the following report:

Caspar Seibel was enrolled on the 23d day of September, 1861, in Company G, Fourth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers, and was honorably discharged at Louisville, Ky., on the 27th day of January, 1865. In his application for pension, filed December 2, 1879, he alleges that while a member of said company and regiment, in the service and in the line of his duty, at or near Edgefield, Tenn., in December, 1864, he was engaged on a scout from Edgefield, Tenn., in the direction of Hopkinsville, Ky., and contracted disease from the exposures on said scout, which resulted in paralysis of his left side, which has affected his left arm, left leg, left side, and left side of his head, and the hearing of left ear.

His whole left side has been disabled to a great extent from date of origination of said paralysis to the present time. The claim for pension was rejected on the ground of no record of alleged disabilities and inability to establish origin of same in service, or of continuance, by sufficient satisfactory testimony.

The soldier says he was in hospital at Murfreesborough, Tenn., for about two months and was never in any other hospital during his service.

Dr. C. H. Butler, of Clifford, Ind., late surgeon of the Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, deposes that in December, 1864, while on a scout from Edgefield, Tenn., towards Hopkinsville, Ky., the soldier contracted disease from exposure, which finally resulted in paralysis of left side, thereby disabling him from making a living by manual labor. This statement is also verified by the report of the Adjutant-General. This was in December, 1879. In May, 1884, the same doctor states substantially as above, excepting that soldier's disease, contracted December 18 or 20, 1864, on raid near Hopkinsville, Ky., was rheumatism of the left side, arm, and leg, of a subacute character, for which disease the said Dr. Butler treated him.

George K. Speed, late captain Company K, Fourth Kentucky Cavalry, deposes that on or about December 18 or 20, at Hopkinsville, Ky., soldier was taken with rheumatism of left side, leg, and arm, and placed under care of Surg. Charles H. Butler for treatment. This he knows from personal knowledge.

The soldier has not been treated by a physician since his discharge from the Army, as he was informed and believed that his disease was of such a nature as to be beyond the reach of medical aid.

After a careful examination of the papers in this case the committee are of the opinion that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my request for unanimous consent to take up the bill which I indicated awhile ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have three or four bills that I have been waiting night after night to get through here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. SPOONER. I must object.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. O'FERRALL, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask for a division, and I give notice now, Mr. Chairman, that there will be no more bills passed here to-night.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that I have several bills that are just as meritorious as his can be. I have no objection to his bill; I think that perhaps it ought to pass; but I have been here night after night to ask unanimous consent for these bills of mine, and they will be reached now in a short time if we go on with the Calendar.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, nearly every gentleman on the other side of the House has had a bill considered to-night.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain the gentleman's question while the committee is dividing.

The committee divided on the motion of Mr. O'FERRALL; and there were—ayes 4, noes 30.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question which may perhaps be a question of order. I want to know why it is that bills are laid aside keeping their places upon the Calendar——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). For the reason that the committee adopted an order by unanimous consent providing that where a member was not present to ask the consideration of a bill when it was reached the bill should be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask that question because I do not see how bills that are far down on this Calendar can ever be reached if we are to proceed in this way, passing over bills but letting them retain their places on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The order was made by unanimous consent of the committee, and at the request of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JACOB BEHR.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4864) to place the name of Jacob Behr on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Behr, late of Company B, Second United States Reserve Corps, Missouri.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the further reading of this report be dispensed with.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I object.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report (by Mr. YODER), which is as follows:

Jacob Behr, a private in Company B, Second United States Reserve Corps, Missouri Volunteers. He claims pension for hernia caused by a fall while on a march, crossing a slough where there was no bridge, and had to cross said slough by jumping from log to log. Evidence shows that he was a sound man prior to said fall; that he was never treated in hospital. He was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability.

The regimental surgeon, Dr. John, of said regiment is dead, who treated Jacob Behr at the date of injury. There is testimony of comrades that he was not able to go on duty and that the report was that he had been ruptured by the fall, but no one living who had personal knowledge from personal examination. The board of examining surgeons found total disability.

For the reason that claimant was unable to produce the evidence of commissioned officer or two comrades who had personal knowledge of the incurrence of disability in service the claim was rejected. But the evidence shows that Jacob Behr was sound at enlistment, able for duty prior to injury from fall, unable for duty after receiving injury, was discharged on surgeon's certificate, and found permanently disabled by examining board.

Your committee are of the opinion that claimant ought to receive a pension, and recommend that the accompanying bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I call for a vote on that.

The question was taken on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and the Chairman declared that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 4.

Mr. O'FERRALL. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will therefore appoint tellers——

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have not troubled the House very much in this way, and I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. COCKRAN. I will withdraw it if that will do you any good. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. The next case is a very meritorious one. I know that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], like myself, has been here night after night, and I believe that he will let us go on and that we shall have time to pass his bill and mine too.

Mr. COCKRAN. How can you go on when the gentleman from Virginia makes the point of no quorum?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, let me make a suggestion. I suggest that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] withdraw his point of no quorum, that the committee rise and pass these bills, and then, after disposing of them, there will be some time left for unanimous consents.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this is the first request that I have ever made in regard to a pension bill. I have attended these Friday sessions night after night trying to get this bill through. It is the only pension bill that I have; it is the only one that I expect to have in this Congress. I want to show my regard for a most worthy and excellent lady who is now dependent, the widow of as gallant a soldier as ever drew a blade. This lady lives in my own town, and I know her circumstances, and I want to get this bill passed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman tells us that this is the only pension bill he has, the only one he ever had, and the only one he expects to have, and as he agrees never to come back to trouble us in this way again, I think we ought to agree unanimously to let him have this one. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will take it on those terms, so anxious am I to get it through.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman does not propose to pass his bill whilst he insists on the point of no quorum on everybody else's bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am perfectly square.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wanted to find out.

Mr. O'FERRALL. You will find me square.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to say this: On this Calendar there are a large number of meritorious bills. Among the members here there are many who have an interest because there are bills for the benefit of parties in their own districts. I have not the slightest objection to the gentleman from Virginia having all the rights any other member has here. It has seemed to the Committee on Invalid Pensions the proper manner to go on with this Calendar was under the order made at the opening of the session to-night. We have found in former Congresses in this manner we can most expeditiously, and I think most fairly, dispose of this Calendar. But gentlemen come here and ask for privileges in calling up of bills on this Calendar which they do not ask for or expect in the consideration of other Calendars of this House. I have no objection to the gentleman from Virginia or any other gentleman presenting to the House bills they consider to be meritorious and having equal rights with other members in that respect, but it does seem to me the gentleman is taking an unfair position in insisting his bill shall be considered, and unless his bill is considered he will raise the point of no quorum, thereby preventing the consideration of every other bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not a bill on the Calendar in which I feel a personal interest that there is the slightest probability of reaching on the Calendar to-night, or even at the next evening session, but I make it a part of my duty to attend these meetings regularly.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. O'FERRALL. How many bills that have been passed by the House were introduced by the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. SPOONER. Possibly one or two; I can not say definitely.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The gentleman has that advantage of me so far as he is concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. One or two.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless gentlemen preserve order and resume their seats the business can not proceed.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am willing to agree to any fair proposition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let us have the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state unless the committee now rises there will not be time in which to dispose of the bills already ordered to be reported to the House.

Mr. CHIPMAN. As acting chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CARUTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report to the House sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED WITHOUT AMENDMENTS.

Bills of the following titles, reported without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 7642) granting a pension to Abbie R. Brown;

A bill (H. L. 6575) for the relief of James L. Alslip;

A bill (H. R. 6845) granting a pension to John Witham;

A bill (H. R. 3712) increasing the pension of Milton Judd;

A bill (H. R. 488) granting a pension to Elizabeth Burr;

A bill (H. R. 8266) for the relief of Mrs. Clarissa G. Green;

A bill (H. R. 8260) granting a pension to Lydia A. Hicks;

A bill (H. R. 3922) to place the name of Caspar Seibel on the pension-roll; and

A bill (H. R. 4864) to place the name of Jacob Behr on the pension-roll.

MRS. MERCY KNIGHT.

A bill (H. R. 2413) granting a pension to Mrs. Mercy Knight was reported without amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend that bill by adding the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month." This is a step-mother case, and that amendment ought to be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED WITH AMENDMENTS.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 6520) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Ward;

A bill (H. R. 3959) granting a pension to Dolly Blazer; and

A bill (H. R. 3745) granting a pension to Mary O'Neil (the title of the latter bill being amended to conform).

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were severally considered, ordered to be read a third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (S. 334) granting a pension to Charles F. Allgower; and

A bill (S. 333) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller.

The bill (S. 738) granting a pension to Enos J. Searles, of Clermont County, Ohio, was considered, the amendment adopted, and the bill as amended read the third time, and passed.

JESSE H. STRICKLAND.

The bill (S. 381) for the relief of Jesse H. Strickland, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment, was considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on this bill, which, without objection, will be concurred in.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be reported favorably to the House with an amendment, the previous question to be ordered thereon, and the further consideration postponed until May 28, immediately after the reading of the Journal, with fifteen minutes' debate on either side, the vote to be then taken on the passage of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN GEIBEL.

The bill (S. 824) granting a pension to John Geibel was considered, and the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House that it be indefinitely postponed was concurred in.

MARY MINOR HOXEY.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 600) increasing the pension of Mary Minor Hoxey. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Mary Minor Hoxey, widow of Bvt. Maj. Benjamin W. Hoxey, late of the United States volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month, according to the rules and regulations governing pensions, which shall be in lieu of the pension which the said Mary Minor Hoxey is now drawing as such widow.

The committee recommend the following amendments: Strike out "50," in the seventh line, and insert "25."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to say simply that I shall not object; but I want the gentleman from Virginia to understand that my refraining from doing so is based upon a very different disposition from that manifested by him when he got up here and said that unless he could get this bill considered to-night he would object to the consideration of any other bill in committee in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Allow me to say that that comes with very poor grace from the gentleman from Maine in view of certain occurrences which took place recently between us on the floor of the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

There being no objection, the bill was considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out, in line 7, the word "fifty" and insert "twenty-five," recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I move to amend the amendment by making it $30.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'FERRALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY H. NICHOLSON.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6317) for the relief of Mary H. Nicholson; and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act there be paid out of the naval pension fund to Mary H. Nicholson, widow of the late Rear-Admiral James Wilson Augustus Nicholson, United States Navy, the sum of $50 per month during her widowhood.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Strike out "Wilson," in the fifth line, and insert "William."

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object unless the same rule applies to it which was applied to the other bill a short time ago, that it go over to a full House.

Mr. COCKRAN. I accept that, with the understanding that the previous question be ordered and the vote be taken on the fourth Monday of May, or the day fixed for the consideration of the Strickland bill.

Mr. CHEADLE. I understood that it was to go over, by agreement, with precisely the same conditions as applied to the other bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York as stated?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARTHA LINTEN.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 7721) granting a pension to Martha Linten.

The bill was read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 p. m. having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SANTA FÉ, N. MEX.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect of an appropriation to complete purchase for a public building at Santa Fé, N. The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred to committees ss indicated:

The bill (S. 956) for the erection of a public building at Boulder, Colo.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will have to insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON] desires it the Chair will retain the bill on the table, and it may be called up hereafter.

Mr. FUNSTON. Very well; let that be done.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire the same disposition to be made of a bill which I desire to call up when the opportunity presents itself.

The bill (S. 1064) was retained on the Speaker's table.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to dispense with the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

TARIFF.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the revenue.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I have no confidence in any crude or hasty methods of changing the tariff policy. Every step taken to change existing conditions should only be made after a careful consideration of the industry involved. The Republican party in its last national platform declared in favor of a reduction of the surplus and of modifying the inequalities of the tariff, and in doing that expressed the wishes of the people in all parts of this country. The only reductions of any consequence that have been made since the war of those tariff duties and internal taxes that were imposed during its progress as a means of raising a revenue for carrying on the Government were made under its administration, but only after a careful study of all the industrial interests of the country, and even then, with all of the care bestowed upon the question, the change of policy was not accomplished without considerable injury to the material prosperity of the nation. The changes proposed in the bill of the committee have been made without consideration and mainly with a view to save and benefit the local interests of the majority, who were alone consulted in the construction of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I grew up under the instruction of men devoted to the doctrine of free trade. My first connection with political affairs was in that stormy period between 1856 and 1860. In those days the issues between the parties on this great question were clearly drawn, but the young men of the time had an object-lesson in the panic of 1857. The Democratic party in its national platform in 1856, following the leadership of the disciples of Mr. Calhoun, declared "that the time had come in the history of this Government for the nation to declare in favor of free seas and progress, free trade throughout the world." And Mr. Buchanan, who had been a protectionist, declared that he would square himself to the platform. The Republican organization, taking issue with them on that great question, declared in their platform in 1860:

That while providing revenue for the support of the General Government by duties upon imports, sound policy requires such adjustment of these imposts as to encourage the development of the industrial interests of the whole country; and we recommend that policy of national exchanges which secures to the workingmen liberal wages, to agriculture remunerating prices, to mechanics adequate reward for their skill, labor, and enterprise, and to the nation commercial prosperity and independence.

Much of the discussion on the other side of the Chamber seems carefully stated with a view to create the impression that it is the policy of the Republican party to raise taxes simply with a view to encourage prodigality and extravagance; but the history of Republican administrations and Republican States proves that no portion of the people have been more careful to limit taxation to the needs of economic administration where it can be done without neglect of material interests and without disregard of imperative patriotic duties. The resolution I have quoted contains the doctrine that has ever been a cardinal principle of the party, that while raising necessary revenues they should keep steadily in view both the needs of the Treasury and the prosperity of the country and the development of its resources, while our Democratic friends tell us that the latter proposition must be excluded entirely, the object being revenue only.

I am warranted in making the statement that the Republicans have been the friends of economic administrations from the fact that there has not been a single reduction of expense of any considerable importance, or a proposal of reduction of salaries, from the enormous salary of the President down to the lowest official, since the new Administration came into power. After all their professions of superior economy, both on the rostrum and in the platform, and after all the charges in reference to the surplus, there has been more inexcusable hoarding of the public money and less manifestation of desire to reduce the public debt than by any administration in the whole past history of the Government. Whether the purpose of this was to produce the condition with which we were confronted history will determine.

It is all a sham and a pretense to say that the tariff must be reduced because we have too much revenue when there are taxes being paid now in the Treasury never before collected in time of peace when their continuation involves vast additional expense. Those who care to go into a thorough examination of the question will find that the great men who, during the early administrations of the Government, occupied the high position of the President of the United States, were all, without exception, the advocates of the policy of protection to American industry, and so recommended in their messages to the American Congress.

General Washington, in his first annual message, of January 8, 1790, made this declaration:

A free people ought not only to be armed, but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite; and their safety and interest require that they should promote such manufactories as tend to render them independent on others for essential, particularly military, supplies.

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

I will not occupy the time of the committee by further quotations from the annual messages of the Father of his Country, though all of them show his continued devotion to the policy of protection to American industry. I need not add that in this he was followed by Mr. Adams, the second President of the United States. Mr. Jefferson, who has always been pointed to by the Democratic party as the ideal of an American statesman, and whose example ought to have great weight with the administration of public affairs at this time, in his message of December 8, 1801, made the following declaration, which I now commend to the careful consideration of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and the Democratic side of the House, especially as it bears on the question of internal taxes. He says:

Other circumstances, combined with the increase of numbers, have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption in a ratio far beyond that of population alone, and though the changes of foreign relations now taking place so desirably for the world may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet weighing all probabilities of expense as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all the internal taxes, comprehending excises, stamps, auctions, licenses, carriages, and refined sugars, to which the postage on newspapers may be added to facilitate the progress of information, and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of the Government, to pay the interest of the public debts, and to discharge the principals in shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated.

The present occupant, mindful no doubt of the vast patronage that would be lost, neglected to follow Jefferson's advice as carefully as he has avoided Jeffersonian simplicity.

I will not read extensively from the various messages of Mr. Jefferson, although they point in the same direction and ought to have weight with every lover of his country; but I call attention especially to a quotation from his message of December 2, 1806. He says:

Shall we suppress the impost and thus give advantage to the foreign over the domestic manufactures? On a few articles of more general and necessary use the suppression in due season will doubtless be right.

But he shows that he would not do that until the entire discharge of the public debt, and on all articles of luxury he would continue the tariff and apply the proceeds to public education, to roads, rivers, canals; and if he were living now he would add railroads.

And yet the gentleman from Missouri the other day urged us to follow the example of Jefferson, but we are gravely informed that the internal system must be continued until the last dollar of the debt is paid.

Mr. Madison, who also deservedly holds a high place in the estimation of all lovers of the country, in his message of May 23, 1809, speaking of this subject, said:

It will be worthy at the same time of their just and provident care to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

And yet many of these branches of manufacture, and especially in new States, will be destroyed if this bill is passed.

The next President, Mr. Monroe, in his message of March 26, 1822, made the following declaration, which I commend to the careful consideration of the majority of the committee and the House:

It is known that no burdens whatever have been imposed; on the contrary, that all the direct or internal taxes have been long repealed and none paid but those which are indirect and voluntary, such as are imposed on articles imported from foreign countries, most of which are luxuries, and on the vessels employed in the transportation—taxes which some of our most enlightened citizens think ought to be imposed on many of the articles, for the encouragement of our manufactures, even if the revenue derived from them could be dispensed with.

And in his message of December 3, 1822, the same distinguished patriot and statesman made the following remarks:

Satisfied I am, whatever may be the abstract doctrine in favor of unrestricted commerce, provided all nations would concur in it, and it was not liable to be interrupted by war, which has never occurred and can not be expected, that there are other strong reasons applicable to our situation and relations with other countries which impose on us the obligation to cherish and sustain our manufactures.

And in his message of December 2, 1823, he said:

Having communicated my views to Congress at the commencement of the last session respecting the encouragement which ought to be given to our manufactures and the principle on which it should be founded, I have only to add that those views remain unchanged, and that the present state of those countries with which we have the most immediate political relations and greatest commercial intercourse tends to confirm them. Under this impression I recommend a review of the tariff for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defense and independence of the country.

I need not say that these views were fully shared in by Mr. John Quincy Adams.

There had already been agitations in the same spirit with which the people are to-day being moved, and denouncing the policy of protection to American labor, and in regard to that Mr. Adams said, and I commend the remarks to the gentleman from South Carolina, who renews those agitations:

Is the self-protecting energy of this nation so helpless that there exists in the political institutions of our country no power to counteract the bias of this foreign legislation; that the growers of grain must submit to this exclusion from the foreign markets of their produce; that the shippers must dismantle their ships, the trade of the North stagnate at the wharves, and the manufacturers starve at their looms, while the whole people shall pay tribute to foreign industry, to be clad in a foreign garb? Is the Congress of the Union impotent to restore the balance in favor of native industry, destroyed by the statutes of another realm? * * * To the voice of just complaint from any portion of their constituents the representatives of the State and people will never turn away their ears. But so long as the duty of the foreign shall operate only as a bounty upon the domestic article, while the planter, and the merchant, and the shepherd, and the husbandman shall be found thriving in their occupations under the duties imposed for the protection of domestic manufactures, they will not repine at the prosperity shared with themselves by their fellow-citizens of other professions, nor denounce as violations of the Constitution the deliberate acts of Congress to shield from the wrongs of foreign laws the native industry of the Union.

The recommendations of President Monroe led to the adoption of the tariff of 1824 and to maintenance of the same policy in 1828; and in support of that policy there was no man more ardent than the distinguished statesman and patriot whose name casts a halo of glory around the State of the gentleman from Tennessee. In a letter to Dr. Colman on September 24, 1824, that patriot—and I wish to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the hour of danger he was a patriot not by substitute, and that the gentleman's extraordinary laudation of the present Executive as a patriot gives rise at least to the suspicion that considering the patronage and spoils of the administration, in view of the hoped-for second term, there are too many men in public life who are ready "to bend the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning;" and I do not think the interests of the present common place Executive will be subserved by the efforts of Mugwumps or Democratic camp-followers to place him on the high pedestal of patriotism.

I have not time to quote General Jackson's letter in full, but the following extract will give the modern apostles of free trade some idea of its import. He says, so far as the tariff has the design of protecting American industry, he is heartly in favor of it, and concludes the letter as follows:

Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus products? Except for cotton he has neither a foreign nor a home market. Does not this clearly prove when there is no market either at home or abroad that there is too much labor employed in agriculture and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out at once the remedy.

And I commend the remark to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Draw from agriculture the superabundant labor, employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs and distributing labor to a more profitable account, and benefits to the country will result. Take from agriculture in the United States six hundred thousand men, women, and children, and you at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes us. In short, sir, we have too long been subject to the policy of the British merchants. It is time we shall become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of Europe, feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing the present policy, we shall all be paupers ourselves.

Has it come to this, that a voice from the grave of Jackson has less influence on a Democratic House than a voice from the grave of Calhoun? These sentiments, held by Mr. Monroe and General Jackson, led to the strengthening of the protective policies that led to the prosperity of the period from then to 1833, mentioned by Mr. Clay and referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan.

This policy of protection has been the unvarying policy of the early Federal and Republican Presidents alike. Patriots all, and alike devoted to the principles of human liberty and equality and the elevation of man. I need not refer to the motives that led to a change of these policies that invented limitations and restrictions of Federal power that had been exercised without question by the framers of the Federal Constitution and that gave rise to incipient attempts at secession so promptly and wisely suppressed by the hero of New Orleans that called forth his patriotic declaration "The Federal Union must be preserved," and which I afterwards saw mutilated and erased from the granite shaft erected to his memory in the great city of his State. I need not tell of the ruin wrought in the country from 1837 to 1842 by that change of policy. I need not speak of the suicidal lines of policy, which, notwithstanding the hundreds of millions of wealth poured in the lap of the nation by the teeming mines of California, after the adoption of the tariffs of 1846 and 1857 wrought the paralysis of trade and financial ruin of the country, and left to the grand young Republican organization as the only inheritance of Democratic policy a nation bankrupt and a civil war.

Mr. Chairman, it was fortunate for the country that that stormy period found that illustrious character whose bones repose near your own home in Illinois, as an occupant of the Presidential chair, and that while he sacredly cherished the views of the fathers as his principles of action, dearer to him even than life, and never wavered in devotion to them, that his heart was wide open to receive and encourage every evidence of a return of attachment to the principles that had been laid down in the Declaration of Independence, ingrafted in the Constitution, and controlled all the early statesmen of the country. Which gave him an abiding faith even in the midst of war—

That the mystic chords of memory stretching from every battle-field of the Revolution, and from every patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over the land would yet swell the grand chorus of the Union when those hearts were again touched by the better angels of our nature.

And it was not less fortunate, Mr. Chairman, that it found the Government of the country in the hands of a party capable of understanding and adopting the policies necessary to develop the great industrial resources of the nation. For vain would have been the heroic and patriotic aspirations of the people had not the party intrusted with the Government been competent to ingraft those emotions into living policies that would develop the national resources and permanently furnish the sinews of war. It is unnecessary to speak of the war period. I pay a compliment to the vanquished when I say that the history of the world furnishes no parallel to the industrial energy that lay behind and sustained and made successful the heroic efforts of the patriotic armies of the Union; and that industrial energy had its strong prop in the policy of protection to American industry.

The theory of the free-traders in this country and of those who sympathize with them in their views is that competition will regulate all the industrial interests of the world, and that the laws of trade should be so modified that every man should be permitted to buy where he could buy cheapest and sell where he can sell dearest. If this would be the permanent result of the new policy it would be worthy of thought; but it only requires a superficial examination to see that the adoption of this theory in practice will lead to the equalization of wages and the rewards of industry throughout the world, and it will level them down rather than level them up. The American laborer may well inquire whether such a change of policy will be likely to improve his condition. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, all of them concede that American labor and laborers are of higher character and are better rewarded under the present system than those of any other nation in the world, and that the industrial progress of this country in the quarter of a century of Republican power has been the most marvelous of that of any nation in the history of the world. While admitting these facts, they strenuously contend that the high character of our laboring population and the marvelous progress of our industries have been made, not by virtue of the tariff, but in spite of its existence. Are the gentlemen entirely sure, have they no question in their own minds as to the truth of these propositions? If this be true, why did they declare in their platform of 1884—

That from the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue, and that such they must continue to be?

Why did they further declare—

That many industries had come to rely on legislation for successful continuance so that any change of the law must at every step be regardful of the labor and capital thus involved?

And yet they propose to change the duties without investigation. Why do they say—

That the necessary reduction in the revenues can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country?

If these declarations were made in good faith why has there been no attempt to investigate and see whether they have complied with the pledge they made to the people? Why do they also declare that sufficient revenue to pay all the expenses of the Federal Government, economically administered, including pensions, interest and principal of public debt, can be got under our present system of taxation from custom-house taxes on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury and bearing lightest on articles of necessity? By this declaration they asserted that if they were intrusted with power they would so administer the Government that all other taxes, except the tariff, would be altogether unnecessary. Why, in view of this pledge, did the President propose to retain the revenue taxes? I ask the gentleman from Missouri if this was not a pledge on their part that they would return to the policies in reference to the collection of the revenue that had never been deviated from in all of the early history of the Government? Mr. Chairman, I hold that it will be the darkest day in the history of our Government when it shall have become an established rule that the great political parties that control the policies and shape the destinies of the nation can with safety and impunity deliberately violate the pledges that they have made to the American people when they were asking to be intrusted with power.

If the great American parties shall be permitted without rebuke to violate the faith pledged to the American people, our free institutions will be in danger; for nothing so greatly tends to their safety as the responsibility of parties. Notwithstanding these declarations from the Democratic platform, the Democratic President of the United States, in his political address to the American Congress, with the approval of a large part of his party, has deliberately ignored the pledges of the platform on which he was elected to power.

A comparison of the rate of wages in this country and in my own State of Iowa, as compared with those prevailing in a number of the leading countries of Europe, illustrates the advantages produced by the American system upon the interest of the laboring men. I do not read the table at length, but will print it as a part of my remarks.

By this it will appear that the advantages to the laborer are largely in favor of the American system of protection. The conditions that in those countries bind men to the classes in which they were born, with no hope of promotion, are familiar to all. Our history, under the operations of our policies, has on many occasions shown that our noblest men and our most heroic characters have come up from the lower walks of life. This shows that the margin obtained by the laboring man for his labor, above the actual cost of living, affords him an opportunity for the culture and development of his mind, awakening an inspiring hope in the mind of every American youth.

The present Secretary of State, in a speech made in Chicago in 1886, made the declaration that it was not so much consequence to the laboring man the amount of wages that he should receive, but that he should be furnished with steady employment. This declaration is only one remove from the old position of the pro-slavery leaders, that the normal condition of the laboring man was that of a slave, and it was more conducive to his interests, for it assured him of care through life and a home in his old age. This view robbed the great mass of men of their grandest inspirations.

The American people of to-day are not prepared to accept as desirable this paternal and narrow theory of the offices of the Government; they prefer rather the theory enunciated in 1856 by Mr. Lincoln, that the policy at the base of our Government was the doctrine that every man should eat the bread that he earned, and earn the bread that he eat. That every man should have the full benefit of all his labor, developing the ability to care for himself, rather than trusting to the care of employers. I remember listening to that inspiring speech at Belleville in 1856. In allusion to a motto on a banner borne by the late General Ousterhous bearing that inscription.

We eat the bread we earn, and we earn the bread we eat.

And devotion to that doctrine was the inspiring motive of his administration.

The gentleman from Kansas a few weeks since pointed out how radically different from these policies were those ingrafted into the constitution of the Confederate States, both with reference to the elevation of American labor and to the policy of free trade. He pointed out that the Confederate constitution provided for the perpetuation of the system of human slavery as the policy of the proposed new government, thereby perpetually degrading labor, and at the same time prohibited the proposed government from levying any duties for the protection of the industries and labor of the South. The gentleman further pointed out the fact that the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee was composed mainly of men who, through all those years, had been devotedly attached to the government proposed to be instituted, periling their lives for four years in its defense; and that the earnestness with which they espoused those theories during that period should give reasonable cause for the apprehension that they were now earnestly endeavoring to ingraft those policies upon the laws of this country. The gentleman from South Carolina boldly sustains that position on the question of free trade in his speech the other day.

I do not in the remarks that I make upon this subject intend to cast any reflection upon those gentlemen, but only wish to apprise those who may hear me that there is danger that the bill of the committee will have that effect, and that it is so intended. I am glad that our country is united and that we have here representatives from every portion of the land lately in arms against us. I am only sorry that they are not here as the representatives of that grander policy by which they were overwhelmed. I regret that they do not yet comprehend that industrial independence is necessary to the growth of this experiment of self-government. Those of us who were in the South at the close of the war realized that the need of that country was industrial development, and in a letter to the Montgomery Mail, in May 30, 1865, I counseled that course. I extract from that letter the following:

Now when the ravages and desolations of war have taxed so heavily the industrial resources of the nation, where so much necessity exists that the sad scars that mar the beauty of the fair face of the country should be obliterated, it behooves the country to economize well all its physical resources. The national credit must be maintained by the gradual payment of the public debts, and to do this the more speedily it is necessary that the public industries should be developed in every possible way.

The progress that has been made is marvelous; but gentlemen should understand that the national policy is a system, and has had much to do with the progress that has been made, and that they can not afford to destroy that system. The strong may be improvident; the weak dare not be.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] gravely informs us that the rate of wages in factories is determined by the rate of wages in independent pursuits, but this is not more true than the converse of the proposition, that the rate of wages in independent pursuits is determined by the rate of wages in factories, and that it therefore follows that any system that tends to hold up or raise wages in any one branch of business or industry operates as a benefit to the labor employed in all. The result has been that farm hands in all of the country have had their wages raised more than 50 per cent. and in my own State from $10 to $12 per month before the war to $18 and $20 since the war, as the result of the policy of protection.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] spoke of the number of mortgages in his State and Iowa and Kansas as the result of Republican policy. That proposition when stated by Mr. BLAND was admirably answered in a short speech a few days since by my colleague, Governor GEAR, and by the distinguished gentleman from Maine, showing that these mortgages were the results of the desire of the enterprising men of the West for improvements. But there is another answer to this. The old Democratic party used the public lands to reward party favorites. They were sold in vast quantities to speculators, and there is scarcely a farm mortgage in Iowa that is not the direct result of the purchase price paid to speculators who bought the lands from the Government and held them until the settlers improved their value, and then they reaped a rich harvest of wealth as the direct result of the policy established by the Democracy and maintained until it was changed by the Republican party in 1861, and yet the gentleman from Missouri lays all this at the door of the protective tariff.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] quoted some extracts from the free-trade papers of the West urging the Republican minority to present a scheme of tariff reduction, and said it was demanded by the people. We heard such talk two years ago, when it was claimed there was danger of Republican loss; but election time came, and what was the result? The people stood by the friends of the system of protection, and the earnest champions of tariff reduction, most prominent on this floor, were retired to the shades of private life, whence they have been taken by the sympathizing Executive, one to occupy a position on the Railroad Commission, and the other has been sent to revel in the hall of the Montezumas, while their places on this floor are occupied by the able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] and the pleasant gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER].

The example of Ireland should serve as a warning to America of the pernicious effect of free trade on a country with insufficient capital struggling against a rival with boundless capital and hedged in and protected by selfish laws. That beautiful island washed by the blue waves of the Atlantic was once the abode of peace and plenty. The blood of her heroes has moistened the sod wherever British glory has planted the flag of Albion, as well as wherever the voice of American liberty has called her patriot sons. The spirit of liberty has been more lofty wherever the Irishman has made his home. Her poets have sung the sweetest melodies that ever touched the heart or melted on the ear. Her orators have made the eloquence of Great Britain equal to the classic eloquence of Greece and Rome, and yet under the pernicious influence of free trade the hum of industry has ceased, the lights have gone out in her once happy homes, the exile of Erin wails his sad lament on every foreign shore, and—

The harp that once through Tara's halls
The soul of music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls
As if that soul were fled.

Thus freedom now so seldom wakes;
The only throb she gives
Is when some heart indignant breaks
To show that still she lives.

The apostle of confiscation of lands, Mr. Henry George, accepts the Mills bill as a long stride in the direction of the abolition of the custom-house and in favor of direct taxation as the means of destroying ownership of land. He says:

As was long ago shown by Abraham L. Earle, one of the few real free-traders among the half-hearted tariff reformers who for some years have been masquerading as free-traders, all the revenue needed by the General Government can be raised, at a tithe of the cost to the people of the present system, through the constitutional provision empowering Congress to levy direct taxes through the States. When the protective superstition is dispelled, when it ceases to be believed that a people can become rich by taxing themselves, the way will be open to abolish all indirect taxes, and to make the taxation needed for the Federal Government fall, through the medium of the States, upon land alone. The discussions of the coming campaign must inevitably tend in this direction. No one can expose the injustice and waste of a protective tariff without at the same time condemning a revenue tariff and, in fact, all indirect taxation.

And that same apostle of free trade, in his issue of April 14, says:

The enemies Mr. Cleveland has made by his message and by his subsequent course ought to make us his friends in this struggle. He may not be a candidate who represents our ideas, but he is a candidate who will do our work—a candidate who will clear our way better than we could possibly do it.

A candidate who will clear the way for the taxation and the virtual confiscation of lands as the sole source of revenue of both the State and National Government is not the candidate wanted in Iowa.

Gentlemen have spoken of grievous wrongs caused by trusts in this country and by combinations of capital here. How quickly gentlemen grasp at wrongs in society to support their views; but those trusts, if they shall attempt to throttle or destroy competition in this country, and to enhance the prices to an unreasonable degree, can be managed by State and by national authority, but what condition of helplessness will be reached if, by cheaper capital and cheaper labor under the operation of free trade, our home industries shall be broken down and destroyed and those trusts shall be organized on foreign soil to cheapen our production and to enhance the value of their own! It is much easier to combine in a small compact territory, under the spur of common interest, sustained by selfish laws, such as England may make, than in the broader territory of the nation where our law may be made to operate as a restraint. The only guaranty against such a condition is the protective tariff which gentlemen seek to destroy. Mr. Lincoln said with much force:

It is easier for people to make laws than for governments to make treaties.

Competition to be beneficial must be close at hand. Where it is distant it is not available, for then the variable element of profit to exchange is uncertain and leads to burdens greater than actual cost of production even under a protective tariff. The whole history of our Government proves this, and it has had ample illustrations by many able gentlemen in this debate.

It has been shown by those who have so ably discussed the question that there is not a single article of production in common use that has not been very materially cheapened by the protection to American labor. This has been finely illustrated in the case of the common article of salt, the protective tariff on which at this time amounts to 1½ cents to every American consumer. The development of the salt industry has furnished employment in several States for many thousands of American laborers, while the result of the growth of the salt industry has been to reduce the price of salt to the consumer to less than one-half of the rate which was formerly paid. I remember in the year 1857 of purchasing salt in the St. Louis market, where it had never been transported over a single mile of railroad transportation, at $2.60 a sack. A better quality of salt can now be obtained in central Iowa, after passing many hundred miles of railroad transportation, at one-half of the price then paid for it at St. Louis.

A great deal has been said in this debate about the influence of the protective tariff in enhancing the price of steel rails. In 1868, before the operation of the protective tariff, we produced in this country only 7,225 tons, and imported 250,000 tons of steel rails, and the price was then $158 per ton. By the development of the industry of home production under the operations of the protective tariff, the home production amounted in 1885 to $1,079,400, and the amount imported was reduced to only $14,850, and the price per ton had been reduced in the process to only $28.50.

The exports of the country, exclusive of specie, for the twelve years ending June 30, 1885, were over and above the imports $1,544,014,480, being a yearly average of $129,500,956 of exports over imports.

The imports of the country, exclusive of specie, for the twelve years of revenue tariff ending 1860, over and above the exports, were $385,768,032, being a yearly average of $32,147,336 of imports over exports. Of these twelve years of revenue tariff our imports exceeded our exports every year but one, while of the twelve years of protective tariff our exports exceeded our imports every year but one.

An illustration of the effect of free trade and foreign competition on prices may be found in the case of the auctioneer with a bankrupt stock. He is hailed with delight with the thoughtless and he sells to get rid of the surplus at any price. If he comes frequently and sells low, local legitimate trade is paralyzed and bankruptcy to honest men ensues. When that happens and the auctioneer gets the whole market there is no limit to his cupidity, for he has no competition.

The balance of trade in our favor in all these years has tended to the cheapening of the rate of interest and to the accumulation of capital here. When it shall have become as plentiful here and the rates of interest as low as in Great Britain, one of the obstacles to fair competition will be removed, but it certainly will not be aided by a policy which shall put the balance of trade against us, and tend to the accumulation of capital in Europe when we shall export the raw material and import the manufactured, leaving all the profits of the production on the other side of the water.

When the facts are so strongly in favor of the policy of protection, both as a means of securing labor to American producers and of securing a reduction of cost to American consumers. It is useless to try to combat substantial, beneficial facts with fanciful theories. The gentlemen on the other side of the House are very anxious that this side should present some scheme of reduction of taxation as a substitute for the scheme on which it seems they are not agreed. Considering the methods of the organization of the committees of the House and the fact that they are a majority party and thus responsible for the policies of the Government on this question of taxation, this request seems unreasonable, but we have a right to demand that the policies which they laid down in their national platform and to which they pledged themselves before the American people should be incorporated in the propositions which they submit to the consideration of the House.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Mr. HUDD] have called the attention of the country to the fact that the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] had intimated a desire on his part, as soon as it could be practicably done, to abolish the system of internal revenue. The gentlemen neglected to state that the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and many others in the South are also pledged to the adoption of the same doctrine. They also fail to state that all of the early Presidents, to whose principles they professed devotion, were devotedly attached to the same doctrine. For my own part, representing in part a State which in 1851, being then Democratic in its politics, declared in their code that the people of that State would henceforth take no share in the profits of the sale of alcoholic liquors, and which, during its entire history, has been true to that doctrine, I had no hesitation to declare my adhesion to that doctrine, and, early in the session of the present Congress, I unhesitatingly declared that I believed the time had come in the history of the American Government for the nation to declare that henceforth it would take no share in the profits of the sale of alcoholic liquors. And I believe it should use its power within its jurisdiction to suppress the traffic.

Why did not the gentlemen in opposing that system of reduction which had been favored by all the early administrations of the Government, which had received the sanction of every Democratic President, and which was indorsed in the last Democratic platform, tell us candidly and frankly that the reasons that they opposed the change are because they prefer the European system of taxation to those which have prevailed in America? Why do they not candidly tell the country that the reasons that they oppose the change is because they are devoted adherents and defenders of that most infamous of all American monopolies—the monopoly of the whisky ring? Why do they not tell us that their reasons for opposing the change and those of this reformed Administration is because it would deprive them of the patronage of five thousand offices and the annual distribution of $5,000,000 as the spoils of the Administration? Why do they not emphasize the statement that this, being a tax, is paid by the consumer, and that the annual levy of $118,000,000 for internal-revenue purposes, while it brings that sum of money, less the vast expense of collection, into the Treasury of the nation, falls as a burden of $800,000,000 upon the poorer classes of the community, and that the six hundred millions of profit arising from this infamous traffic in which they seek to interest the whole American people as a permanent source of revenue falls heaviest, and with most crushing weight, upon the poorer classes of the community, without any compensating advantages, and merely because this immense sum of money—the gains of that traffic—has been liberally used and is always a reliable source of income to the Democratic organization as a means of public corruption?

They know very well that the tax has not decreased the consumption; that it falls upon the poor and their unhappy families as a capitation tax, and in many cases deprives the poor victims of the common comforts of life; that they have given this most gigantic and infamous monopoly, hedged in by tariff laws, and exempted from tax till the moment it is paid by the consumer, the exclusive privilege of debauching the public morals and cultivating pauperism, vice, and crime, because the saloon in American politics is the faithful ally of the Democratic party and is ready to contribute a liberal share of the hundreds of millions of ill-gotten profit wrung from the humble poor and their unhappy families toward the corruption of the ballot-box and to general demoralization, and because their masters, the saloon power, wants to retain its unhallowed monopoly. And this they do in defiance of all Democratic precedents and against the declarations of their platform.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] spoke in glowing terms of the condition of the world to-day as compared to the time of the Roman Empire. His picture was overdrawn. I doubt if the condition of the laboring many, in many of the countries of Europe so far as the comforts of life is concerned, is much improved over the time of the Roman Empire, when the "heart of the Goth was with his young barbarians all at play far away on the blue imperial Danube." I know so far as political influence is concerned, most of those people are under the deep stagnation of military depotism. I, too, have a dream of a grand future for the world and for Europe—"when the war drums will throb no longer, when the battle-flags will be furled," and when all disputes of an international character will be settled "by the parliament of man in the confederation of the world."

But that day will come, if ever, not by free trade, drawing American down to the level of European labor, but by protecting American industry, by educating and elevating American labor, and thus by our influence bringing Europe up to the level of America. This was the aspiration of the great men whose opinions I have quoted, and who laid broad and deep on this continent the foundation of our system of government. When the time shall come in Europe when the aggregated capital shall have ceased to monopolize all the blessings of life; when those governments shall cease to be great trusts, sustained by bayonets and military despotism, consuming the earnings of labor; when labor shall eat the bread it earns, then, and not till then, free trade may be adopted without degradation to American labor. Then the hope of the poet will be realized—

> And man to man the world o'er
> Will brothers be for all that.

For my own part I have no hesitation, representing as I do mainly a great agricultural community, but containing within its borders many enterprising cities just beginning the development of the manufacturing resources of the State; believing as I do that the adoption of this bill would be destructive to these enterprises and to every material interest of the State; looking back upon the grand progress of the nation during the years of Republican power; having seen its marvelous growth from a nation of 30,000,000 inhabitants to one of 60,000,000, which have been doubled in the period of its power; having seen the manufacturing production of the country increased from two billions in 1860 to nearly seven billions in 1880; having seen the material wealth increase from sixteen billions to forty-two billions in the same period, I have no hesitation in declaring that we are not willing to try again an experiment that has hitherto been fatal to every American interest, and that has brought ruin to every door, if we may except the importers in our large cities, of whom the policy made so many millionaires in the period before the war.

Mr. Chairman, we have recently passed a bill to celebrate with appropriate ceremonies the revolution 1789 in France. The revolution which, notwithstanding its excesses, did so much for human liberty was mainly brought about by the influence of our American example upon European affairs. France seemed to have settled down into the stagnation of military despotism.

It was an era of hope to the world when our nation escaped from the throes of civil war, and our ancient ally re-established the rule of the republic, and then adopted our policies of administration. The titled aristocrats have no approving word.

A few years since a distinguished Frenchman, Bartholdi, conceived the thought of the grand statue of Liberty to be placed at the entrance of New York Harbor, as it looks upon the sea as a type of the grandeur and power of the Republic. That conception of the Frenchman was only made possible by the history of the Republic in the quarter of a century of Republican power. The influence of genuine American principles has not only affected the destiny of our old ally, but its inspiring example is entering into every part of the American territory.

The hum of industry, formerly an unknown sound, now pervades every portion of the South; railroads are entering its territory, enterprises are arising from the ashes of war, and blazing forges, as so eloquently stated by the gentleman from Alabama some time since, are now seen where formerly congregated camps of invading armies.

It is under the influence of American policies that a new South is arising, and we hope that new and liberal political forces will be developed all over that territory and new and startling types of national sentiment will arise that will imprint forever on the brow of the Republic the imperishable sentiment, "Union and Liberty, now and forever, one and inseparable." [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. FORD, by unanimous consent Mr. KERR'S time was extended until the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, I approach the consideration of the bill now before this committee with marked hesitancy and trepidation, knowing as I do that it affects the welfare of more than 60,000,000 of our people, and reaches in its ramifications to every part of the civilized world.

The question of taxation, Mr. Chairman, has been mooted ever since the formation of the Constitution by the ablest minds and the greatest statesmen that the world ever produced; and it may be deemed presumptuous in me to stand here and attempt to discuss this important question. But when I come to reflect that the 250,000 people who sent me here, together with the great Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent, are deeply interested in this matter which is under consideration, I hope that I may be pardoned when I venture to state some views in relation to this great question.

To my mind this whole question, Mr. Chairman, resolves itself into one of taxation. I have read the Constitution of my country and I find in it the powers which were delegated to the Congress of the United States are fixed, and that those powers are clearly written upon the pages of that fundamental law. Section 8, Article I, of that instrument provides that Congress shall have power to do what?

> Power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

They may impose taxes, they may collect taxes upon the people for the purposes specified in that article of the Constitution, but for no other purpose. And such, as I understand it, has been the teaching, the practice, and the training of that grand political organization of which I have the honor to be an humble member.

But my Republican friends will say to me, "You may go beyond the mere power, the mere purpose expressed in the Constitution of the United States and you may levy and assess taxes not alone for the support and maintenance of the Government, economically administered as we understand it, but you may go further and assess taxes for the purpose of protection."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House for awhile to this view of the Constitution. I am frank to say to the gentlemen here who belong to the high-protection school of politics that I for one am prepared on the floor of this House to-day to say I do not believe in the doctrine of protection for protection's sake.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TARSNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I have the New York Tribune of this morning in my hand, in which I find what purports to be a statement of a conversation or interview with the gentleman now speaking, and said to be revised by him, in which he opposes putting lumber and salt upon the free-list.

Mr. TARSNEY. I am not the editor of the New York Tribune.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I am aware of that, but wish to ask the gentleman if that is a correct representation of his position?

Mr. TARSNEY. You will understand my position before I get through. My position will be placed before this House and before the country so plainly "that he who runs may read."

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Further than that, the gentleman proposes, it is alleged, to make an amendment to the bill touching the question of protection to the salt and lumber interests.

Mr. TARSNEY. When the time comes, Mr. Chairman, and this bill is under consideration for amendments, I will take such course as my duty to my country and my constituents induces me to believe I ought to take. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Then I ask the gentleman, is he in favor of continuing the protection upon salt and lumber?

Mr. TARSNEY. Will the gentleman keep still until he hears me, and then he will understand.

I heard a distinguished gentleman on your side of the House—one of the leaders of your party—say the other day that it is impertinent to interrupt a gentleman without invitation. Now——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. A single word in explanation. I asked the gentleman if I might interrupt to ask a question, and he said I might. Now he says it is impertinent to interrupt to ask a question. He gave me the permission; I sought to ask him a question, which he declines to answer.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman will see that I answer the question.

Now, I say to you gentlemen who believe in the doctrine of protection, for protection's sake, that I do not belong to that school of politics. Is that plain enough? But I do belong to that school of politics which believes in the collection from the pockets of the American people of just so much money as is necessary and proper to economically conduct the affairs of this Government, and not one dollar beyond. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As to the method or manner of collecting that money, that is another thing. Two systems have been resorted to for the purpose—one through the medium of the custom-house, and the other through the medium of the internal-revenue laws; and while it has been said here, even by way of a personal reference to myself, that we are free-traders, I stand here to deny it and say that we are not. We are fair traders. We are not trying to pull down the custom-houses of the country, but we are here to say that we propose to continue the customs systems of taxation, but with the intention of revising the existing laws so as to bring the taxes down to the lowest amount of necessary revenue to provide for the wants of the Government, and not one cent beyond; and in so adjusting these laws as to place the duties highest upon the luxuries of life and lowest upon life's necessities. [Applause.] Now, then, do you understand me?

Mr. Chairman, on the 19th day of this month I stood upon the floor of this House when another bill was under discussion, and simply by way of illustration, with no purpose of raising any tariff discussion then, referred only incidentally to the existing tariff laws and their inequalities as one of the causes of the labor troubles which were the subject of discussion in the bill then under discussion. For that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] sought to take me to task; but I want to say to him that he then misunderstood my language on that occasion.

I did not attempt to inflict any tariff discussion on the House; but I intended to use, and did use, that reference simply by way of illustration of numbers of others of the wrongs which, in years past by, my Republican friends, were ingrafted upon the statute-books by you during the twenty-five years you had control of the administration, as one of the causes of the existing troubles. This is the language I used:

Equalize your laws. Press the fight that was opened in this House on yesterday, if you please, and so frame your tariff laws that we shall not have a few millionaires in this country kept up at the expense of pauperized millions of people.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that language to-day. Whether this bill in its present form, whether the phraseology of it as presented by the committee suits me or does not suit me, is not a question that is before this Chamber to-day. When that time comes, when my vote is to be cast upon this bill, I shall not be found wanting to act my part on the floor of this House as a Representative of the people.

But you, my Republican friends, say we must protect. Protect whom? First, you say the laborer; second, the farmer; and third, the American manufacturer. Pardon me, if for a little while I call your attention to the claims which you make about protecting the different classes of our people. I find by an examination of the tariff list, embracing more than forty-four hundred articles upon which there is a range of duty that must be paid through the custom-house, of from 30 to 100 per cent., that many of these duties are upon the necessaries of life. I find also that while you are pretending to protect the American laborer you are placing him in this dilemma: The coat that he wears upon his back, the shirt with which he is covered, everything that he uses and are necessities for his wife and his children are taxed through the medium of the custom-house. I was perfectly astonished the other day when I listened to my distinguished and eloquent friend and colleague from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to hear him announce the startling doctrine that it was not the consumers who pay the tax to the custom-house, but the importer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me illustrate that position for a moment. I know not where the cloth that is in the coat on my back was manufactured, but suppose it to have been made in England or in France. When it came through the custom-house in New York or in Boston the importer paid upon it a duty of something over 50 per cent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Sixty-eight per cent.

Mr. TARSNEY. I thank the gentleman—68 per cent. Now, when that duty was paid and the goods were sold to the wholesale dealer in New York, do you suppose that the import rate of duty was not added to the price? The wholesaler added that to the price of the cloth in his store in New York when he sold it to my clothiers in East Saginaw, and they in turn sold it to me; they, as a matter of course, charged the duty up to me. In that case do I not pay a tax upon the coat that I wear, even though it may be made of cloth of foreign manufacture?

Why, sir, I have here something which upon its face looks like a refutation of the position taken by my distinguished colleague [Mr. BURROWS] the other day. I hold in my hand the original invoice of some goods that were purchased in Frankfort-on-the-Main. They cost $46. The rate of duty upon them was 40 per cent. They passed through the house of L. W. Morrison in New York, and were consigned to Heavenrich Brothers & Co., of East Saginaw, Mich. Forty per cent. on $46 is $18.40, the amount of the duty upon those goods.

Mr. GEAR. What were the goods?

Mr. TARSNEY. Come over here and see the original invoice if you wish.

Mr. GEAR. I do not care to do that. I will take your word for it. What were the goods?

Mr. TARSNEY. They were clothing goods. The original invoice is in German, and if you can read it you may come over and do so; I can not, but I have the intermediate invoice.

Now, take that case by way of illustration. In that event, if I bought those goods I say I paid to the Government of the United States $18.40 as a tax upon the purchase, and that money went in as a part of the revenues required to maintain and run this Government.

But, sir, suppose the goods were manufactured in Massachusetts or in Connecticut and were sold to the wholesaler in New York, and then again by him to my clothiers in Michigan and they in turn sold them to me? The New England manufacturer, possessing all that innate selfishness that is common to humanity, desires to make all that he can out of his surroundings, and he knows that his foreign competitor can not reach his market without passing that tax-barrier of from 40 to 100 per cent. in the custom-house; and therefore that manufacturer, irrespective of fair and legitimate profits, and simply for the purpose of taking advantage of his position, raises his price 45, 50, or 55 per cent., and in turn the goods are sold to me and I pay his profit. In both cases I pay the tax. In the first case I pay my tax to the Government of the United States; in the other I pay it to the New England manufacturer. That is the only difference.

Now, then, whom do you protect? My Republican friends will answer: "Labor." How do you protect labor? The product of labor is protected, but is labor protected? The product can not pass through the custom-house without the payment of duty; but who ever heard of a duty being levied in any custom-house in America upon a workingman? How many times in the last fifteen years when labor, restless under the exactions of unjust taxation and unjust laws, has presumed, as some people might put it, to assert what it believed to be its rights—how many times, I say, have the workingmen been thrown out of employment, and you, caring not where they came from or where they might go, have looked elsewhere for people to take their places? You have gone to Ireland, you have gone to England, you have gone to Wales, you have gone to Hungary, and to Italy, ay, to far-off China, and imported labor, and when that labor came to the port of New York or Boston on the East, or San Francisco on the West, did it pay duty? No; but it came upon the custom-house dock, bade good morning to the customs officers, and walked in, free and untrammeled, in open competition with the American labor that you pretended to protect but never did protect. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Wherein, then, lies your protection to American labor? Oh, but you say, "We protect the American farmer." How? Some of my Republican friends will answer, "Wool."

Yes, you have been pulling wool over the eyes of the American farmer for a good many years, attempting to make him believe that you were protecting him under your so-called protective policy. But let me call your attention to this fact, my Republican friends, that whatever protection the American farmer had upon his wool you struck down by one fell blow by the act of the 3d day of March, 1883. You reduced the duty upon the farmer's wool which you are now pretending to protect, and when he rises and says: "I am not protected under this system; I want to inquire into this thing and see who did it," I can answer and say to him, "Shake not thy gory locks at me; thou canst not say I did it." Neither did the Democratic side of this House at that time do it, for by the yea-and-nay vote which is indelibly recorded upon the Journal of this House I find the names of some gentlemen who are now clamoring loudly about protecting the American farmer's wool, but who then voted to reduce the duty upon it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I contend, then, that you do not protect the farmer; but that, on the other hand, upon everything the farmer purchases, the plow, the hoe, the griddle, and the skillet, upon everything that he uses, you require him to pay tribute, and tribute to whom? If I remember the figures rightly now as I pass hastily along there were, according to the last census, only 44,019 institutions and corporations in the United States that were protected—not individuals, but institutions; that is the whole number that were protected under the tariff laws; yet to-day over 60,000,000 of people are paying tribute to this small manufacturing class.

Let us see, then. You do not protect labor; you do not protect the farmer; but you do protect the people that I have indicated, the people who own the mills and the factories, and you require the balance of us to pay tribute to them. Now, what do we want? We want simply to equalize the laws of taxation. Our policy is not destruction; our policy is reduction. I believe, sir, I have the honor to be the only gentleman upon the floor of this House who assisted, even in an humble degree, in making the platform upon which the first Democratic President in twenty-four years was elected. I had the honor of representing the commonwealth of Michigan in that memorable convention which nominated Grover Cleveland. Many comments have been made about that platform and about its meaning, and "we" have been spoken of as free-traders. I answer, we are not free-traders. In that platform we said what we meant, and we meant what we said. Does this look like free trade? I read from that platform:

That platform says:

But in making reduction in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be. Moreover many industries have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance, so that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital which is involved. The progress of reform must be subject in the execution to this plain dictation of justice—all taxation should be limited to the requirements of economical government. The necessary reduction can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

Then the platform adds this significant language, which leaves no room for the internal-revenue system:

Sufficient revenue to pay all the expenses of the Federal Government economically administered, including pensions, interest and principal of the public debt, can be got under our present system of taxation from custom-house taxes on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury and bearing lightest on articles of necessity.

Now, sir, what does that mean? Does it mean free trade? Not at all. But we recognized at that time, and foretold to the country by that platform and in that declaration of principles, that the system of taxation made, not by us but by you, which had been ingrafted upon our statute-books, and which was then and is to-day absorbing from the pockets of the American people in the form of taxes nearly or quite a million of dollars a day, half a million in excess of the actual needs of Government—by that platform we said to the American people, "We propose to revise this system of taxation, but not to destroy; we propose to reduce the taxes levied upon you, and to collect them in the same manner, if you please, but to collect no more than is required to properly conduct the Government."

Mr. BAYNE. Does that mean that the internal taxes are to be reduced at all?

Mr. TARSNEY. I have not the paragraph of the platform with me which refers to internal taxes, but I will tell you what it meant. It meant this and only this: When you present to the Democratic party the question whether we shall have cheaper whisky or cheaper shirts we say to you we prefer cheaper shirts and dearer whisky. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. How about tobacco?

Mr. TARSNEY. I will come to that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no room for misconstruction. The statement is fairly made to the country.

There is one question I want to call your attention to again. We are speaking here of that great class of our citizens designated the agricultural class. If this beneficent thing you call protection is a good thing for the farmer, will somebody at some time answer me on this floor and tell me why the value of farms in this country in 1850—I have them here—the per cent. of gain in the value from 1850 to 1860 was 100 per cent.; the increase in value from 1860 to 1870 was 41 per cent.; from 1870 to 1880, under your beneficent policy of protecting the American farmer, while you are hugging him all to pieces because you love his vote, was only 9 per cent. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'DONNELL. Will my colleague permit me?

Mr. TARSNEY. Certainly.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Do you maintain this tariff injures the agricultural interests? Now, you are aware in the State of Michigan, a State which you and I in part represent here, the value of farms increased from 1880 to 1884 $81,000,000. This must be so because I find it in the Detroit Free Press, a good Democratic paper you will admit, and the personal property on those farms increased in the same four years in value $19,000,000, making a total of $98,000,000 of increase in the value of farms and personal property in the four years. Did that come from the depression of the tariff.

Mr. TARSNEY. It came in spite of the tariff. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. O'DONNELL. I know it came in some way, and I am glad to know the gentleman appreciates it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TARSNEY. No man will go farther than I will in paying tribute to that great commonwealth of Michigan, from which you come and in which I was born. Its natural resources, its productive soil, the industrious aptitude and intelligence of its people have developed a wealth which has increased and is constantly increasing largely.

When, however, I speak of percentages, I take the tables from the census during three decades. I have given to you the average throughout the entire country, and yet under your system of protection, as I have already stated, the last decade, from 1870 to 1880, showed only an increase of 9 per cent.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Will my colleague permit me to call his attention to another fact during the same period?

Mr. TARSNEY. Certainly.

Mr. O'DONNELL. In the same period the aggregate wealth of the State was $1,800,000,000, and now it is a little over two billions. That is a million a week of increase during that period of time.

Mr. TARSNEY. I am glad of it, and I hope it will continue to increase a million a week for the next decade. I want, however, to have a week set apart for myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'DONNELL. I noticed that by the tenor of your remarks.

Mr. TARSNEY. Will my colleague permit me to say——

Mr. O'DONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. TARSNEY. That I never yet knew of a community that got rich by being taxed to death. [Laughter.] It may be there is some hidden wisdom, some method by which this result can be brought about, but I declare I can not understand how the common good of the whole country can be enhanced by levying taxes on it in excess of legitimate needs.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Permit me to call your attention to another matter. The increase of wages in the State of Michigan in manufacturing industries in the same time I have spoken of—four years—was 80 per cent.

Mr. TARSNEY. What is that?

Mr. O'DONNELL. I have stated that the increase in wages in the manufacturing industries in Michigan for the same period was 80 per cent.

Mr. TARSNEY. Ah!

Mr. O'DONNELL. Allow me.

Mr. TARSNEY. Wages paid increased in volume, but the per diem compensation was not increased, but was lowered within that time.

Mr. O'DONNELL. If you will allow me for one moment. I have lived in Michigan for a little while. I reside in the county which has the honor of giving birth to my colleague.

Mr. TARSNEY. I will yield to a question, but not to a speech.

Mr. O'DONNELL. It is not often I make a speech, and I wish to set the matter right in reference to Michigan.

Mr. TARSNEY. I have been always right on that subject.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I doubt that. Will you permit me to finish my brief remarks?

Mr. TARSNEY. I can not yield further; you will have all you want when I get through.

Now, then, let us see how this affects the farmers from our standpoint. We all know in this great and growing country the aggregate wealth is increasing and increasing rapidly.

Mr. O'DONNELL. And yet all this time the "robber tariff" was in force.

Mr. TARSNEY. We want to so fix and shape the tariff laws of this country that its wealth will increase with still greater rapidity. How? We all know that we raise more wheat than we can eat, more corn than we can consume, more oats and other products of the farm than we need, and when we have satisfied the American appetite we must find a market for our surplus products somewhere else or else allow them to rot. It is but a few years ago that the United States supplied Great Britain with nearly all their breadstuffs.

It is not so to-day. Why? Remember now that the price we get for our surplus products abroad regulates in every instance the price we receive at home. Liverpool and London regulate the price of wheat in New York, Chicago, and Minneapolis. Now, then, how are we going to better this condition of things? I answer: Find a market. Again I ask: Why do we not sell our surplus products there as we did formerly?

Remember that nations are very much like individuals, and in fact they are but combinations of individuals, after all. "If you won't trade with me I won't trade with you."

Mr. O'DONNELL. Now let me ask you a question.

Mr. TARSNEY. No, not now. And the result is because of our restrictive and in many instances prohibitory rates of duties on commodities coming from France, Germany, England, and elsewhere. These nations have turned their attention in other directions. They have gone to Russia and Egypt, ay, with their long lines of railroad they have penetrated the very jungles of India and builded up in that region one of the greatest wheat-producing countries in the world.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Now, I want to show the gentleman that Michigan is doing just the same thing.

Mr. TARSNEY. I can not yield.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I will give you a part of my time.

Mr. TARSNEY. When did you get any time? [Laughter.]

Mr. O'DONNELL. I will get time, if I have to move to strike out the last word. I want to say to my colleague that we are trying in Michigan to make that demand for our products every time right there. Now we have succeeded to a considerable extent, as I shall demonstrate. In 1880 there were employed 77,535 persons in various branches of manufacturing industry. In 1884, just four years after, there were employed 128,907——

Mr. TARSNEY. What has that got to do with the selling of wheat?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Simply that we are establishing a market for it right at home.

Mr. TARSNEY. Well, now I decline to yield for the gentleman's argument any further.

Mr. O'DONNELL. But I want to show the gentleman that these are consumers of wheat, these additions to our population.

Mr. TARSNEY. Well, suppose they are. You do not want to eat over a bushel of wheat a day, do you?

Mr. O'DONNELL. No; but some of these people may want to buy some of the clothes that you were speaking of a little while ago. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TARSNEY. I hope my colleague will permit me to proceed. I yielded for a question and not for such an interruption as this.

Mr. O'DONNELL. But this is a Michigan question. The increase in four years of persons employed in manufacturing industries was 57,372.

Mr. TARSNEY. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me further. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I ask the Chair to request the gentleman from Michigan to take his seat. I have the floor, and I shall attempt to hold it.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Well, I have got this part of the floor, and I am trying to hold it, but you will not let me. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARSNEY. I have got on to your "pitching," as the base-ball men say.

Mr. REED. But you have not got the ball.

Mr. TARSNEY. Now you say we are going to have a home market in Michigan.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Yes, that is just what we are doing.

Mr. TARSNEY. Well, my answer is, as I said before, that we produce more of the products of the American farms than it is possible for the American markets to consume. That being the case, we must have a market elsewhere for the surplus products of the farmer or else the farms will go to ruin. Tell me [turning to Mr. O'DONNELL] how if you please, when you do get the floor, will the farmers in Michigan, where 47 per cent. of the farms have a blanket upon them in the shape of a mortgage, how they can pay off those mortgages, which, to the farmer, is a cloud by day and by night, unless he can sell somewhere the products of the farm?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Well, I wanted to show my colleague. Will he now allow me?

Mr. TARSNEY. No, I can not yield for an interruption.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Let me state, then, that while the farms of Michigan have 20 per cent. upon them, English farms are mortgaged to the extent of 58 per cent. of their value. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TARSNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat——

Mr. O'DONNELL. I will yield my time to my colleague. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman from Michigan treats this great and momentous problem that is before the House to-day, which I am discussing in a most serious manner, as something simply to be jeered and sneered at; but let me say to him to go back to the State of Michigan among the agricultural districts from which he comes, and conduct himself there as he has conducted himself upon the floor of the House to-day, and I venture to assert to him that he will never get back.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I did that and my constituents increased my majority in the last election from 1,200 to 5,000, whereas yours decreased from about 2,000 to about 500. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TARSNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that our farmers can not pay their mortgages, they can not thrive and prosper unless they can find a market for their products. And where are they now? Why to-day, under your restrictive, and in many instances prohibitory rates, you could not even get an American hog into the German Empire, even with a passport from the Secretary of State. Why? We would not deal with them, and they turned around with their laws of retaliation.

Now, then, what shall we do? Let us deal with the world not upon free but upon fair terms. The time was in our history under what these gentlemen are pleased to term a free-trade era when 77 per cent. of the exports of this country was the product of the farm, and when 78 per cent. was shipped in American bottoms, in ships built in America, of American materials by American workmen, and manned by American masters and American seamen. To-day the order is reversed and we carry less than 12 per cent. of the exports of this country.

Go with me to-day, if you please, to the city of New York and stand on the heights of Brooklyn bridge and look down the bay, and amidst the thousands of masts that you will see not one in a hundred will you see floating the Stars and Stripes.

Your system has driven our commerce from the seas. I want to see the day when our shipping interest will be revived, and when we can go to the ports of any civilized nation and see our flag floating from the mast-heads of American vessels, built by American workmen. I want to see those vessels go out from our ports to the ports of the world and bring back from them in exchange for our products the products of those foreign countries which we need and can not produce.

I want to sell them our corn; I want to sell them our wheat; I want to sell them the products of our farms; and I want to bring back in exchange, upon fair reciprocal terms, the products of those countries. Give us that and then there will be an incentive to American shipbuilding that does not exist to-day. Give us that and then there will be some reason for rejuvenating the American navy. There has just been started over in Philadelphia to-day an effort to form an American navy to protect our merchant marine, which now exists only in the imagination of individuals. When that time comes then prosperity will come to the farmer, and not until then.

Labor has never been protected and the agriculturist has been robbed. The only class, so far as I can see, that has been benefited by reason of the system is the few that own the mills. No employé in the mills is protected.

I hold in my hand a table showing the prices of the products of the American farmer from 1852 to 1861. Then the abnormal period during the civil war is omitted. The table begins again in 1867 and runs down to 1880. There are the prices of the products of the American farm. During the first period the prices averaged higher than the prices ever did under your high protective policy during the second period. These tables I shall print.

In addition to that, I remember that from after the close of the war until the 1st of January, 1879, the money that the farmer received for the product of his farm was not a 100-cent dollar, but that he was paid by a Treasury note and the circulation of national-bank notes, which at that time was much lower than the rating price of gold.

I hold in my hand a table showing the highest and lowest prices of gold in the period stated here, and which indicates the real prices which the farmer received for his product.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TARSNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. You have a statement there of the different prices for American farm products before and since the war. Have you coupled with that a statement of the prices of manufactured products also?

Mr. TARSNEY. Not in that table.

Mr. BAYNE. Is it not a fact that manufactured products are selling for 33 per cent. of what they were before the war?

Mr. TARSNEY. They might sell a good deal cheaper if the tariff rates were reduced.

Mr. BAYNE. But your statement will show that agricultural products have fallen probably from 40 to 50 per cent., while a statement of the prices of manufactured products would show that they have fallen from 60 to 75 per cent.

Mr. TARSNEY. I will deal with that when I reach it. I listened to my distinguished and eloquent colleague from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] when he was comparing the prices of Bessemer-steel rails. The gentleman happened to forget there was a time once, and I remember it well, when steel rails were purchased for $128 a ton. I know of one such transaction, at least, and perhaps had something to do with it. But at that time there was a royalty on steel rails. A man named Bessemer had a patent. That patent has expired, and that has much to do with the reduction of the price of steel rails.

Now, how shall the reduction of the tariff be brought about? I say go about this reduction coolly, go about it calmly, go about it unselfishly, go about it as business men sitting down to figure out a business proposition, and follow out the tenets of our platform of 1884. Let us deal with these industries in this country that have been built up even upon a false basis with a sparing hand. Give them a sliding scale. Let them adjust their business to the changed order of things. And always keep in view the fact that the laws of taxation must be revised and that the rates must be reduced until we can say we are collecting taxes only for the support of an economically administered Government, and whatever protection you get let the thing you call protection come as the incident but not the object of your legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say a word or two to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY], now that he has closed, because I did not want to interrupt him while he was on the floor. He stated that a large number of the members of this House, with Senators and distinguished officials, had gone to-day from Washington to Philadelphia to see the inauguration, as I hope it will prove to be, of the new Navy—to be present at the launch of the cruiser and the dynamite vessel from the ship-yard of the Messrs. Cramp & Sons, of Philadelphia, on the Delaware River. I am extremely sorry that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] himself is not present there to-day; but I presume he could not leave on account of his desire to make his tariff speech. If the gentleman had gone on that trip he would have seen employed in that ship-yard over two thousand men, skilled mechanics, skilled laborers, and laborers unskilled, all at work and all drawing large wages, wages sufficient to support them and their families, men who are efficient and happy in the occupation which they follow.

Now, sir, if this bill, which I call a free-trade bill, passes in the form in which it comes from the Ways and Means Committee it will break up that industry. I call it a free-trade bill. It may not have been in the mind of the gentleman from Michigan, when he framed a part of the plank in the national Democratic platform, that he was framing or helping to frame a free-trade platform, but certainly his President in the annual message has framed a free-trade platform and has spoken out in the clearest language of the Democracy for free trade and against protection.

I say, sir, that if the gentleman could have been present in Philadelphia to-day he would have seen those thousands of men working who, if this bill passes, which strikes down the tariff upon many articles which enter into the building of ships, would be brought down to idleness in many of the departments of that industry. And if perchance that excursion which has gone over to-day to see the launch of those vessels shall be taken by the committee in charge, as I hope it will be, farther down the Delaware River, they will see the ship-yards of Roach & Co. at Chester; they will see on the other side of the river, within the limits of the district of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HIRES], another ship-yard where ship-building is going on and where hundreds of men are employed.

But even, sir, if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] were a member of that excursion he probably would not be convinced, for I do not suppose he can be convinced that the passage of the Mills tariff bill, so called, would stop the work in those great hives of industry, and that the thousands of men and women who are now profitably employed in the various manufacturing establishments within the limits of the city of Philadelphia and other cities, where they are obtaining remunerative wages, would be deprived of their employment and of the means of living.

Mr. Chairman, let me state a fact for the information of the members present, for many of them may not know it, as men naturally look principally to their own localities; I want to state to this committee that within the city of Philadelphia, with its population of a million of people, 200,000 and over are engaged in manufacturing establishments, making a good living for themselves and their families.

Mr. MCKINLEY. And buying the products of the farmers at good prices.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. And, as my friend from Ohio suggests, buying the products of the farmers at good prices. In that city there are turned out every day—and you may count every day of the three hundred and sixty-five in the year—more than a million dollars' worth of products from manufacturing establishments. The product of those establishments is indeed amazing, the aggregate being nearly $400,000,000 a year. Let me add, sir, that within my recollection the population of that city has grown from less than 200,000 to be, as I am sure will be shown by the census that we are going to take in a year or two, over 1,000,000.

And what does this progress arise from? It arises from the enterprise of the men who have capital and who have invested it in the 12,000 manufacturing establishments that exist to-day in the city of Philadelphia. And, sir, let me add another fact: Although the city has increased so rapidly in population, yet the working people of that city, by their industry, their economy, their thrift, and the good wages which they receive in those manufacturing establishments, are enabled to live comfortably, and every one of them in a house of his own.

There are one hundred and seventy thousand dwelling-houses in the city of Philadelphia! Think of it! One hundred and seventy thousand dwelling-houses! More than the entire number of dwellings in the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn together, and they have been built mainly from the earnings of the men who are employed in those manufacturing establishments. And yet, sir, my friend from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY], and others who favor the free-trade ideas of the Mills bill, do say that protection to American industry has not operated for the benefit of the individual man. I say that the farmer, the laborer, the merchant, every one, has been benefited by the protective system, which is the system proposed and advocated by the Republican party of this great country, and it is that question which is going to decide in November next that the masses of the people of this country will indorse protection to American industry and elect for us a Republican President, who will carry out that idea, not only in his messages, but by his influence and his power, wherever he may go. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to extend my remarks even thus far, but it seemed to me that I might very properly rise here and say that I regretted that my friend from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] was not present with other members of this House on the Delaware River to-day—that he had not availed himself of this opportunity to go and see for himself that great city which has been built up by the capital invested in her manufacturing establishments. If that gentleman and others like him could only be taken through the length and breadth of that city, they would come back here with their minds changed on this great question, and would be convinced that while free trade destroys, protection builds up not only the cities but the country, and advances the interests of all our citizens. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. At the commencement of the gentleman's remarks I understood him to say that if the Mills bill was passed it would result in closing the great ship-yard to which he referred in such eloquent words—the great iron-ship building yard of the Messrs. Cramp & Sons, now engaged in the construction of cruisers for the Navy. I understood the gentleman clearly to say that the passage of the Mills bill would result in the closing of that ship-yard and throwing two or three thousand men out of employment. Did he not say that?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I said that. I will explain.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have a little more time to explain how the passage of the Mills bill would result in closing those ship-yards which are now engaged solely upon the construction of the vessels for the United States Government, and which, as I understand, would be closed to-day if they did not have those orders from the Government, there being no ship-building for merchants to occupy them.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman misunderstood me, or I, perhaps, did not make myself very clear upon that point. Of course it is temporary employment that is given to those ship-yards by these Government contracts, and those gentlemen obtained those contracts because their bid was the lowest and the best, and because it is acknowledged all over the country that the work of Philadelphia shipbuilders is the best work that is done in the line of building iron ships in this country. That employment, I say, is temporary, but those shipbuilders have the building of merchant ships also, and now I say that if you adopt the policy of the free-trade bill which is under discussion here, and if you adopt the policy announced by the chairman of the Committee on American Marine and Shipping to let ships in free, you will destroy one branch of that great American industry.

I do not know how the Secretary of the Navy feels upon this subject, whether he comes right up to the point which the President has reached or not, but I do know that if you followed out the policy announced by the President even these very contracts could have been given to English ship-builders and those vessels might have been constructed upon the Clyde, and the American mechanics who are now engaged upon them would thus have been deprived of the wages which they now receive for that work.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I wish to ask the gentleman if there is any provision in the Mills bill which proposes to admit ships free.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I do not say that, but I said that there was a bill reported and pending for that purpose.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Oh, a bill pending! We are talking of the bill now before the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My friend from Pennsylvania speaks of what would be the result of the passage of what he denominates the Mills free-trade bill. Does the gentleman regard the tariff schedule fixed at the beginning of the war in the Morrill tariff bill as a free-trade schedule?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will not the rate of duty be as high, on the average, under the bill that is proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] as under that Morrill schedule?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As a general thing, no. The gentleman well knows that the bill made by Mr. MORRILL—I was in this House and helped to make it—was made under entirely different circumstances from those now existing.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My friend says that he helped to make that bill and that it was not a free-trade bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then, in view of the fact that that bill carried a rate of duty no higher than that which is proposed in the Mills bill, how comes it that the gentleman pronounces the Mills bill a free-trade bill and at the same time asserts that the other was not a free-trade bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the Morrill tariff bill was made at a time when, as the gentleman from Tennessee knows, we were in entirely different circumstances from those that exist to-day.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; the difference is this: Then we had an immense war on our hands, which was an excuse for high taxation, while now we have no war and no excuse for such taxation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But now we have no one but Democratic free-traders demanding any change of the existing tariff rates. No one has come here demanding any such change, while those who have come here in the interest of protection have not been heard by the Committee on Ways and Means or otherwise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to ask my friend another question. I wish to ask him whether he agrees that we have an excess of revenue to-day.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. We have.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman oppose tax reduction?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I propose the repeal of the excise laws to a great extent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My friend will bear witness that the total repeal of the internal-revenue system will leave us with a deficiency of $60,000,000. Now, upon what does he propose to impose that tax?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Now, I propose we should collect by a tariff for protection sufficient money to carry on the Government and to protect American industries. That is what I propose. I propose nothing else.

I say here again, I am speaking to the point of ship-building. I have a pile of correspondence from men who furnish supplies for such establishments as the Cramps, begging us not to pass the Mills tariff bill because it strikes down the tariff and the duty on certain articles which enter into the building of ships. They say to pass that bill would be destructive to their interests. That is the opinion of men who are engaged in this business and understand what are their needs.

Mr. BAYNE. As I understood the proposition of my colleague, it was this, that the Mills tariff bill, as it is called, conjoined with the bill reported from the Committee on Ship-Building, intended to allow the introduction of free ships into this country.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not hear the gentleman say "conjointly."

Mr. BAYNE. That to carry out the policy of free ships and also to carry out the provisions embraced in the Mills tariff bill would result in the discharge of the workmen in the ship-building yards of Philadelphia and thus put a stop to that great industry.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to state most explicitly that if the policy proposed to be enacted by the Mills bill in conjunction with the other bill in reference to ship-building were to be carried out, while it would result in benefiting those interested in manufactures in Great Britain, it would be most disastrous to the interests of the American mechanic.

Mr. BYNUM. I did not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make any allusions in his preceding remarks to the bill for admitting free ships.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes, I did, specifically.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman state how the Mills tariff bill would destroy the industry engaged in the construction of ships by the cheapening of materials which enter into their construction? Why would that be the case if the duties were reduced on the materials of ship-building?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It would upon all the materials which enter into the construction of ships.

Mr. BYNUM. Then the gentleman holds to the doctrine that the result of allowing the materials which enter into ship-building to come in at a cheaper rate would be of no benefit to the ship-building interest in this country; that it would not benefit that interest to have cheaper materials?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Oh yes; the ship-building interest would be benefited if they were to build ships upon the gentleman's theory of giving cheaper wages. In my judgment, and I say it with great respect to the gentleman, the Mills tariff bill, together with the provisions of the bill reported from the Committee on the Ship-Building Interest, would destroy to a great extent the building of American ships and send them—the ships now being built at the Cramps' yard in Philadelphia under contract for the Government, as well as all other ships being built in America—to the Clyde, to be constructed by British workmen.

Mr. BYNUM. One other question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BYNUM. There is another question on another branch which I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He spoke of the home market furnished to the agricultural interests by those engaged in manufactures. Now, is it not a fact that in Pennsylvania, which is a great farming as well as a great manufacturing State, that that State of Pennsylvania produces a surplus of agricultural products?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It produces a great deal, but I doubt if it produces a surplus of agricultural products.

Mr. BYNUM. Does not the agricultural interest of the State of Pennsylvania to-day produce a surplus of agricultural products?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not believe Pennsylvania does produce a surplus of agricultural products.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman will find that it does.

Mr. BAYNE. According to what authority?

Mr. BYNUM. The census of 1880.

Mr. BAYNE. I have not the figures before me, but I undertake to say that the State of Pennsylvania does not produce a surplus of agricultural products.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman will consult the authority he will find that it does.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman can not point me to any such authority.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The rich counties, like Lancaster and Chester, adjoining the city of Philadelphia, sell at good prices the products that they raise to those engaged in the manufacturing interest in the city of Philadelphia, but I doubt very much whether the State of Pennsylvania, with all its great agricultural products, does supply more than is needed for the manufacturing industries in that State.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that the State of Pennsylvania consumes more agricultural products in the manufacturing districts than are consumed in the non-manufacturing districts?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; beyond all doubt.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is wheat higher in the State of Pennsylvania than in Kentucky?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As I have said wages are higher——

Mr. McMILLIN. Supply is regulated by the price in Europe, and when that price falls one-half of one cent a bushel in Europe it falls from Maine to California at the same rate, one-half of one cent per bushel. That proposition can not be gainsaid.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Of course the agricultural products of the great West, or the surplus of those products, are shipped to Europe, and the price of those products depends upon the price which is fixed in Europe, and they will have to depend upon that price when they are in the ports of the eastern seaboard for transportation abroad.

I will only add this much, though not bearing directly upon this question: that because of some of the provisions of the interstate commerce bill, to-day the shipments abroad are not as great as they were formerly. That is one of the results of the passage of that bill.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that not only are the agricultural products of Pennsylvania worth more than they are worth in agricultural States, but is it not also true that farms are worth more per acre, and farm labor commands better wages?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly. The price of farms is great in Pennsylvania, far greater than in many of the agricultural States of the Union farther from the seaboard. Lands in agricultural portions of the State of Pennsylvania, where farming land is cultivated to a very high degree, and to a considerable extent by machinery, bring very large prices per acre. In fact, to those who live in the far distant agricultural States of the country the price is amazing; and all that prosperity in the price of land is brought about in that great State with its five and a half millions of people because they have had protection to American industries, and the American laborer has been protected in his workshop or on his farm, and in all branches of industry where he chooses to employ his labor in productive energies of any kind.

Mr. BYNUM. May I ask the gentleman another question? Do I understand the gentleman to hold that protection increases wages, increases the number of manufactories, and increases prosperity?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYNUM. Then why do not you raise it higher if it accomplishes that? Would not the same logic hold good that it would extend prosperity further?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not favor what is called the review of the tariff to-day. I want to review the tariff and revise it when we have a Republican President and a Republican House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. We would have to wait too long for that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to have it done in a House of its friends, not in a House of its enemies. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORD. The gentleman says he wishes the tariff to be revised in the House of its friends?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FORD. Do you not think it would be just about as well to call upon Bob Ingersoll to revise the New Testament as to expect the Republican party to revise the tariff? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FUNSTON. Your party never revised it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. This is not tariff revision brought in here by a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, but a tariff reduction and tariff destruction.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly. I can not refuse to yield to my namesake.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. If a high tariff makes high wages, how is it that in New York the laboring people receive from 10 to 50 or 100 per cent. higher wages than in Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That is easily answered. It is because we have a difference in the cost of living in New York as compared with Philadelphia. Living in New York is much higher than in Pennsylvania. I will give you that as a satisfactory answer.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Then, that being the case, and New York being compelled to pay a higher price for the labor engaged in manufacturing industries there, why is it that the cheap labor of Philadelphia does not break down the higher-priced labor of New York?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The cheap labor, as the gentleman calls it, in contradistinction to the price of labor in New York and Philadelphia, is satisfied with the wages it gets there, and there are certain conditions which make it satisfactory. The laborer in Philadelphia gets that for his toil which satisfies him; he gets a good living and his family get a good living. In New York City the expense of living is much greater, rents are higher, and the people do not live in houses as they live in Philadelphia. The laboring man in Philadelphia owns his own house, while in New York you will find family after family occupying the same house, or living together in these large tenement houses. The Philadelphia laborer owns his own house, and because he owns it he is satisfied with a lower rate of wages.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentlemen allow a question just here?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I move that gentlemen be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. McMILLIN. We will extend them right here.

I want to ask the gentleman a question, growing out of the line of argument he has been pursuing, for he seems now to have shifted his ground and holds that it is not the tariff but the cost of living which makes high wages. Is that his position?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir. The tariff which protects all American industries protects the laboring man as well. It brings an equivalent in wages. But the laboring man is willing to spend his toil there by the week or the day or the year, because he has his own home and a comfortable living.

But this Mills tariff bill, if you pass it, if such an event should or could ever occur—it could not occur in this present House of Representatives in its present shape, for it can never pass this House—but should it by any misfortune become the law of this country, and we had to live under the Mills tariff bill, many of you would come back, even at the next session of Congress, distressed because you had oppressed the laboring man and reduced his wages and consigned him to a state of poverty far beyond that which he has been heretofore compelled to bear. The laboring people of this country are bettering their condition every day.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

The gentleman from Michigan spoke of the revision of the tariff by the Republican party as being somewhat like a revision of the Scriptures by Bob Ingersoll. Is it not true that there has been no revision of the tariff since the Republican party came into existence in this country except by the Republican party itself; and is it not absolutely true also that the Democratic Houses that have been here year after year have never succeeded in revising it, and have never even succeeded in carrying their own party in revising it?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. You never succeeded in lowering it. You have always raised it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. With the help of the Democratic party we could lower anything in the world.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. You will never raise it again.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] gives the correct history of tariff legislation.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman yield to me again?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYNUM. Did not your own commission recommend a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent. in 1883?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But the men who had the interests of real protection at heart did not carry out that recommendation.

Mr. BYNUM. My question was, did not your commission recommend a reduction of 20 to 25 per cent.? Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish I had time—I suppose time would be given me——

Several MEMBERS. We will give you time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish I had time to go over a little of the history of the attempts of the Democratic party in the way of tariff legislation.

Mr. BYNUM. Did not your commission recommend a reduction of tariff, and did you not, under the pretense of reducing it, increase it? Is not the tariff higher now than it was before?

Mr. BAYNE. We did not carry out the recommendation of the commission because we found on investigation it was not a proper thing to do.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It did not meet the views of many who were in this House and who were protectionists—myself for one.

I do not propose to go over the history of tariff legislation. I was a member of the House when the Wood tariff bill was introduced; when the people of this country were tortured by the speeches of the free-traders and the followers of Fernando Wood, who is now dead and gone. That was a bill which never should have been permitted to come before the House, and which could have been prevented from coming up if men had stood firmly at their post of duty. Circumstances only brought that bill before the House; and it was soon defeated.

So with the Morrison bill. The business of the country is always in danger when there is an attempt made by the Democratic party to revive the tariff. So to-day. I am one of those who would hasten the general debate upon this bill and would hasten action upon it, so that the country might see that there were men upon the floor of the House of Representatives who were willing to stand by our great interests as patriotic men, so as to destroy at once any hope of the Mills tariff bill ever becoming a law, or even being passed as it is now before us by the House of Representatives of the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to have been on the floor so long. But this all-around, off-hand discussion has been very pleasing to me, and the interruptions have not annoyed me. [Laughter.] I had some idea of making extemporaneous remarks upon the general principles of the tariff some time during the discussion of the bill, not entering into details. To discuss the details extemporaneously would be dangerous. To do that a carefully-written speech, and we have had a number of such speeches, much to the enlightenment of the committee, is the most judicious way to present the subject, for there is danger of errors in the statement of details in tariff legislation unless you have them before you in well considered and prepared written form.

But I might as well say what perhaps gave me the notion of saying something to-day; I rose simply to say a word for Philadelphia industries in reply to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY]. What I am about to state shows the interest felt there in this great topic. Yesterday morning I received a letter from a young lady [laughter] who is about to graduate at the Normal school in Philadelphia [continued laughter], in which she said she had been designated as one of those who at the commencement were to speak on the question of protection to American industries. So you can see that this question finds entrance into the schools and households of Philadelphia. Thereupon I sat down and wrote something for her; gave her a few points, and that put me in the notion of making, not a speech, but what I have said to-day.

Hence I have said what I have said. I have been glad to answer the questions of gentlemen as they have been propounded, and I have been glad to answer them fairly and squarely and properly when I could. But before I take my seat I want to again emphasize the fact that I am a protectionist of protectionists. I am a protectionist all over.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did the young lady ask for your protection?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Well, as is my habit, I politely answered her letter, because one of the things I have been brought up to do is to acknowledge the receipt of any letter which comes to me from any one.

Mr. BYNUM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he indorses the extract which I am about to read from General Grant's message:

> Those articles of manufacture which we produce a constituent of, but do not produce the whole, that part which we do not produce should be entered free also. I will instance fine wools, dyes, etc. These articles must be imported to form a part of the manufacture of the higher grades of woolen goods.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have my own views of what a tariff should be. [Laughter.] General Grant, dear man, had his, and he always spoke his sentiments in a manly way. He was a man who, when you approached him, either in person or by letter, always had an answer for you; you always knew where he stood. [Laughter.] Now, that brings me back to this point. Some of these gentlemen in their interrogatories have spoken about the free-list. I recollect the day when upon this floor I protested against the extension of the free-list, which in my opinion was already too far extended. I looked at the figures a short time ago, and I found that the aggregate exemptions from duty fell very little short of the aggregate of the duties collected upon imports. For my part, I would be very careful about extending the free-list. I would extend it only where it was absolutely necessary. I was called to account on my side of the House by gentlemen for the expression of my views on that subject. I must say that I thought at times that the extension of the free-list was made to serve personal interests; I thought that many a line was put into that list which bore directly upon certain interests, perhaps here present. The question of the free-list is very important to the doctrine of protection, and, as I have said, I would extend that list only where it was absolutely necessary to aid the manufacturing interests of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have got through. I have been ready to answer questions as well as I could. The committee has listened to me with patience, and I thank the gentlemen who are present for their courtesy. I did not expect to protract my remarks so far as I have done, but I do not wish to make any apology, because speech is free in this Hall, and whenever a man can get the floor he has the right to take advantage of it until he becomes a bore to those sitting around him. [Laughter.] If he only knows when to stop, I think he does well.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYNUM. Do you indorse this extract which I now read from President Arthur's message?

> Without entering into minute detail, which, under present circumstances, is quite unnecessary, I recommend an enlargement of the free-list so as to include within it the numerous articles which yield inconsiderable revenue, a simplification of the complex and inconsistent schedule of duties upon certain manufactures, particularly those of cotton, iron, and steel, and a substantial reduction of the duties upon those articles, and upon sugar, molasses, silk, wool, and woolen goods.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not suppose there is any one present to-day who had a greater admiration for President Arthur than I had. His administration of this Government was the administration of a patriot, and it was conducted under very trying circumstances; but, sir, President Arthur, from his surroundings, never was on the same platform, as a protectionist, with the Pennsylvania Republican protectionists. His surroundings were different and his recommendations on these subjects did not meet the approval of the Republican protectionists—at least the Republican protectionists of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAYNE. Or of other States, either.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Or of other States. The views of President Arthur on this subject were not adhered to by the Republican Representatives generally. That is the answer that I make to the gentleman's question, and I have made that answer at other times and in other places heretofore. With all the goodness of President Arthur, with all the advantages which the country derived from his administration of the Presidency, it must be said that upon the question of protection he did not stand upon the same platform with protectionists brought up and educated as I have been, and as those who come here to represent the State of Pennsylvania generally have been. Has the gentleman any other quotations from distinguished individuals about which he would like to ask me? I should be glad to hear them if he has. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman voted for President Grant and for President Arthur, did he not?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; I did, and I do not know, but I think I would have been one of the 306 who voted to renominate President Grant, such was my admiration of him.

Mr. BYNUM. You voted for him and you would have renominated him after he had delivered this message which you say if carried out would destroy American industry?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would have taken him under any circumstances as President of the United States. [Laughter.] He was not afraid and the country knew it. He filled the Presidential chair as a man and as a patriot, and when he spoke he spoke what he believed; he never concealed his thoughts. A man who conceals his thoughts too much, Mr. Chairman, does not come up to my measure of a man. I do not mean that a man should say this and that to everybody at all times and in all places, but this absolute secretiveness, which is sometimes seen, never suited my idea of manhood. I like the man who is frank, who does not conceal, who speaks his mind upon proper occasions.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. From your last remark I infer that you would admire the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who said frankly here the other day that he wanted to buy the products of labor in the cheapest markets of the world, and also to buy labor itself at the cheapest price.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not hear Mr. HEMPHILL's speech, but I can easily see how it impressed itself upon my colleague [Mr. BAYNE]. [Laughter.] And, Mr. Chairman, this brings to my mind some statistics which I saw a few days ago showing the relative cost of living in England and in Massachusetts. The statement must have been written by a Massachusetts man—an intelligent Massachusetts man. [Laughter.] Massachusetts men generally are intelligent; they generally know what they are talking about. I read this statement with pleasure. I think I have it in my room now; I wish I had it here. It was a comparison of the cost of living in the two countries with reference to the labor question. In the English towns which it mentioned the wages of labor amounted to $7 or $7.50 per week. In the Massachusetts towns the wages amounted to about $10 per week. Now, the cost of living to the laborer in the English towns mentioned was within 25 or 26 or 30 cents of his week's earnings. That was all that he had left from his wages to give to his family for any little provision in the way of luxuries; whereas in Massachusetts the cost of the laborer's living was about $8 a week; so that every week he had an excess of $2 above the cost of his living to give to his family for other little matters that they might require. The American workingman had $2 a week to spare, while the Englishman had not more than 30 cents a week. Mr. Chairman, that illustrates the difference of living for the workingman under the system of protection to American industry and the system of free trade as carried out in England.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. If I do not interrupt the gentleman, I wish to say to him that the high wages paid to labor in the State of Massachusetts are paid in industries which are not protected, but which are largely taxed by the tariff.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But do not they get the benefits of the protective system all the same?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The highly protected industries do not pay high wages. The most highly protected industries there pay as low wages as are paid in Lancashire—I mean the great cotton industries of Massachusetts and of Rhode Island.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that can not be. [Laughter.] I do not say the gentleman makes a misstatement, but it can not be. I take the figures to which I have referred, made by a Massachusetts man, to be true. They are gathered from statistics, and I believe them to be correct. I know in my own heart and soul that the American workingman anywhere, in any line of manufacture, in any line of industry, in any kind of work in this country, is better off at the end of the week than the foreign workingman. I know that and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] knows it, and gentlemen on the other side of the House know it. They can not shut their eyes to the fact. They want to build up an argument for free trade by appealing to the laboring man of this country as to how he is "oppressed" and telling him that the Mills bill will relieve him.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman must know from his own knowledge of manufactures that not one industry in ten in a great hive of diversified industries like Massachusetts can be reached by the hand of protection. They are paralyzed by tax, not protected.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. This is the first time I have ever heard it announced that the workingman in Massachusetts is an unhappy man, or that his family is an unhappy family. [Laughter.] The workingmen of Massachusetts have advantages which the workingmen in many other parts of the country do not have. They have an established school system; they are well educated; they toil for certain hours of the day, and then they go home and are happy in their households, and they are happy in their occupations also because the State is a Republican State and favors protection. [Applause on the Republican side and laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Are the laboring men of Massachusetts paralyzed by the amount of money which they deposit in the savings-banks in that Commonwealth?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I was not speaking of the laboring men, but of the general industries of the State.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It is then the manufacturers who are paralyzed. I understood from speeches of gentleman on the other side the other day while the manufacturers were swimming in wealth the laboring men were gaining nothing by protection. I am told now by the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is the manufactures, or protected industries, as he calls them, that are paralyzed.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The list of the bankruptcy courts for the last ten years in reference to the woolen manufacturers of Massachusetts will show how many of them are being paralyzed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend does not look paralyzed.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am not in that business.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. We will take the paralysis off wherever it exists when we get to the tariff bill and have the opportunity to amend it.

I wish to say this in behalf of the workingmen of Massachusetts. I have only had the opportunity of seeing them for a few days when passing through that State. But, sir, there is a system of frugality, of economy practiced in the State of Massachusetts which produces in respect to the laboring men in that State a most favorable condition of affairs. They have thereby been enabled with their good wages to accumulate in the savings-banks large sums of money. They have become accustomed to it, and it has reacted upon all other interests in that State. It is a good system, and just so soon as it is learned and practiced in other States its beneficent results no doubt will be precisely similar.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Surely it is not possible the gentleman from Pennsylvania is attempting to argue the theory on the other side, that the people in free-trade countries are more happy than in protected countries. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, I can not look on it in any other light than the travelers who go to Europe and pass through England, Ireland, and Scotland and see the misery of the people there. I can not think that such men are superior to the American laboring men and the American mechanic, who receive high wages and are enabled to put away in the savings-banks such large sums of money as we know they now have there on deposit.

Mr. TARSNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Why, I got up to reply to something you stated in your speech, and it would be most ungracious on my part not to give you a chance to get in now. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARSNEY. Is it not true that the territory to which you refer, of Ireland, was stolen from the people?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes, I know something about that, something about the history of that part of Great Britain, for, sir, my own ancestor came from a part of that country. I am not speaking in reference to the point to which the gentleman has referred. I am speaking now of the difference of the laboring men in England and the laboring men in this country. I took for my illustration what I have given you from this little pamphlet, showing the condition of the laboring men in the State of Massachusetts, and the fact of the savings which they are accumulating in the banks there. I am through.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts. I wish to say to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I live in a city where there is a great number of manufactures—woolen, cotton, paper, steel, and iron—and its statistics show the wages there are from 65 to 75 per cent. higher than they are in Great Britain; the cost of living is no higher, and that the only thing which is higher is rent. I wish to say further that the working people of that city are more than one-half of them depositors in the savings banks as the effect of the protected industries in which they are engaged. And what is true of that city is true, I believe, of every other city in Massachusetts. I believe, too, if the Mills tariff bill be passed the effect will be to reduce the wages of those laboring men, and that our people could not save and would not be in the condition of prosperity they are to-day.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. In looking over my papers I find I have the little pamphlet to which I have referred. I want to have it printed with my remarks. It fully sustains the remarks which I have made on the subject to which it refers. I commend it especially to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL]. It certainly comes from Massachusetts. I never knew a Massachusetts man who did not get up and defend another Massachusetts man, and I present this little pamphlet as the product of Massachusetts.

It is as follows:

WAGES, PRICES, AND COST OF LIVING UNDER PROTECTION.

Wages and living in Lancashire and Massachusetts.

To the Editor of Bradstreet's:

SIR: I send you the following by way of helping to solve the much-discussed question as to the comparative wages and cost of living of the wage-earning classes in the United States and Europe, but particularly in Great Britain. In the following comparison as to wages and cost of living in England and Massachusetts a family of two adults and three children in each country is supposed to consume the same quantities of the same articles; that is, to be placed on equality as to scale of living, clothing, and sundries not being included in either case. Each family is supposed to consist of a four-loom cotton-weaver, with wife and three children, two of the latter working in the mill. In neither case is the wife supposed to work. The English weaver is a Lancashire operative, working fifty-six hours per week, and his two working children are half-timers. The Massachusetts weaver works sixty hours per week, and his two working children are employed thirty-two weeks in the year. The wages of the Lancashire operatives are based upon the rates given in the report of Albert D. Shaw, United States consul at Manchester, England, transmitted December 1, 1881, to the Department of State. The wages of the Massachusetts operatives are based upon the average rates paid in that State January 1, 1882, the weekly wages of the children being their average weekly wages for the entire year—that is, one fifty-second of their total yearly wages.

The Massachusetts weaver earns per week	$5.64
Two children in weave-room, each average per week $2.33	4.66
Total income per week of the family		$10.30
The Lancashire weaver earns per week	5.28
Two children in weave-room, half-timers, each per week, 84 cents	1.68
Total income per week of the family		6.96
Excess of weekly income in Massachusetts		3.34

Each family is supposed to consume the following, the same being the weekly subsistence of an English operative's family of the size under consideration, presented in the Progress of Manchester, by D. Chadwick, of the British Association, revised by Dr. Watts, and quoted by Leone Levi, in Work and Play (London, 1887), page 129. The English prices are based upon rates current in Lancashire from the report of Consul Shaw, before alluded to, December, 1881, and from other official sources. The Massachusetts prices are average rates current in said State, January 1, 1882:

Prices and quantities consumed per week.	Retail cost at Lancashire, England.	Retail cost in Massachusetts.
Bread, 8 four-pound loaves	$1.20	$1.28
Corn-meal, ½ peck	.22	.22
Flour, 6 pounds	.26	.27
Fresh meat, 5 pounds	.95	.80
Bacon, 2 pounds	.36	.40
Potatoes, 40 pounds	.40	.84
Milk, 7 quarts	.42	.42
Vegetables	.12	.12
Coffee, Java, ¼ pound	.16	.16
Tea, ¼ pound	.12½	.15
Sugar, 3 pounds	.24	.30
Rice, 2 pounds	.08	.20
Butter, 1 pound	.30	.35
Molasses, 1 quart	.12	.16
Soap, 1½ pounds	.10	.10
Coal	.36	.62½
Oil	.12	.10
Rent, 5 rooms	1.20	1.50
Total per week	6.73½	7.99½

That is to say, it would cost the family in Lancashire to live, not including sundries and clothing, $6.73½; while the family in Massachusetts, consuming the same things and the same quantities, would expend $7.99½; extra expense in Massachusetts per week, $1.26. I have previously shown the excess of weekly income in Massachusetts to be $3.34, and, therefore, deducting therefrom the extra expense of living, there remains a net excess of income per week in favor of Massachusetts of $2.08.

Out of the total weekly income the Lancashire family would have for sundries and clothing (after providing for the items of expenditure contained in the foregoing table) the sum of 22½ cents, while the Massachusetts family would have for the same purpose $2.30½.

It should be remembered that the items of subsistence quoted are those actually consumed by a Lancashire family of the size named; and in the comparison the Massachusetts family is supposed to consume precisely the same articles and quantities, no allowance being made for any change in the style of living.

It will be seen that the wages of the children vary more than those of the adults, and that this variation, being in favor of Massachusetts, is an important element in producing the excess of weekly income shown in that State. The wages of the children should, however, be included in the earnings of each family, as these wages are the saving factors of the income product both here and in Lancashire, it being nearly impossible to support a family containing more than three members in either locality from the earnings in this industry of the father only. Should the wife work in the mill, and her earnings enter into the comparison, the relative position of the families as to excess of income would not be materially changed, as the wages of adult females in the two countries do not vary more than those of adult males.

I also present a comparison between the condition of a Blackburn cotton spinner and that of a Massachusetts cotton spinner, prepared in the same manner and on the same basis as that taken for the weavers.

The Massachusetts mule-spinner earns per week	$10.09
Two children, frame-tenders, each average per week, $1.85	3.70
Total income per week of the family		13.79
The Blackburn mule-spinner averages per week	7.80
Two children (little tenders, half-time) each per week, 96 cents	1.92
Total income per week of the family		9.72

Excess of weekly income in Massachusetts, $4.07; net excess after deducting $1.26, the extra weekly expenditure of the family in Massachusetts, $2.81. The family of the Blackburn spinner would have for sundries and clothing, after providing for the items specified in previous table, $2.98½, while the Massachusetts family would have for the same purpose $5.79½. I believe this statement to be as fair and as just as it is possible to make it.

Respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Chief of the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor Statistics.

BOSTON, March 15, 1882.

There is not one American in twenty who is not clad from head to foot, out and out, with American products—his coat, hat, boots, linen, and flannels. His watch, his knife, his pencil, his gloves, and his jewelry are also American products.

HOW FARMERS HAVE BEEN HELPED BY PROTECTION.

In an interesting letter published in the New York Herald in 1882, respecting the stock-raising of the country, the author introduced for comparison the following prices of farm produce and stock as found in a paper published in the interior of the State of New York in 1816 and the prices of the same at the present time:

Products.	1816.	1882.
Wheat was then from	$0.25 to $0.44	$1.42
Corn	.12½ to .20	.60
Oats	.15	.60
Eggs, per dozen	.05	.15
Barley, per bushel	.25	.80
Butter, per pound	.05 to .12	.40
Cheese, per pound	.03 to .06	.13
Cows, per head	16.00 to 20.00	$20.00 to 100.00
Cattle, per yoke	25.00 to 45.00	100.00 to 250.00
Hay, per ton	3.00 to 5.00	10.00 to 20.00
Straw, per ton	2.00 to 4.00	7.00 to 16.00
Carriage horses, per span	150.00 to 200.00	500.00 to 1,200.00
Sheep, per head	.50 to .75	1.50 to 2.50
Farm labor, per month	3.00 to 8.00	12.00 to 25.00

Formerly, and, indeed, nearly to the date that American manufactures assumed an importance, the farmer was obliged to exchange his produce for store goods at very high prices, cash being almost out of the question. The following prices in 1816 and 1882 for a few manufactured goods and other merchandise purchased by the farmer indicate the great change in favor of the agricultural classes and other consumers during the interval:

Articles.	1816.	1882.
Cost of steel, per pound	$0.17	$0.10
Sawplate, per pound	.40	.26
Nails, per pound	.12½	.04
Broadcloth, per yard	16.00	4.00
Wool blankets, per pair	$10.00 to 20.00	$3.00 to 10.00
Cotton cloth, per yard	.30 to .50	.04 to .12
Calico, per yard	.25 to .75	.04 to .16
Salt, per bushel	1.00 to 4.00	.15 to .25

That is to say, the average increase in the price of farm produce during the last sixty-six years has been from 300 to 400 per cent., while the average decrease of the price of manufactured goods during the same period has been from 20 to 90 per cent. All of which is due to the introduction of diversified industries engaged in manufactures and fostered by a protective tariff.—Boston Journal.

Now, I want to say, in reference to some ideas which seem to prevail in the House, that it can be proven in Pennsylvania, and the city especially which I in part have the honor to represent, the protection city of Philadelphia, and the State is, as you all well know, a protection State, so much so, indeed, that there is scarcely a bit of difference of opinion or sentiment between Democrats and Republicans representing Pennsylvania upon tariff questions, that no man in any one of our districts could live in political life if he was not a protectionist. You may take any one of our Democratic districts in Pennsylvania, and no man occupying a seat here to-day, if the direct issue of free trade and protection was presented there prior to the election, could be elected to the House of Representatives from that State.

Mr. BYNUM. Was not Mr. SCOTT elected upon the revenue-reform ticket? He advocated revenue reform.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; he was elected on account of Republican differences in his district, and my colleague from the adjoining district can tell you more about that than I can.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say this, in reference to Mr. SCOTT and this tariff issue, that the Democratic party, in my opinion, never squarely raised this issue until it was raised by President Cleveland himself.

Mr. BYNUM. Now, let me say——

Mr. BAYNE. One moment—just wait a moment. We have time enough here. President Cleveland had the manliness and the courage to raise that issue squarely and fairly for the first time in the history of the Democratic party since 1861; and I think it is due to the people of this country that they should pass upon that issue before we revise the tariff. I say this, Mr. Chairman, because the Democratic party never before was understood to be, as a party, favorable to any such revision of the tariff as is proposed in this Mills bill. That is to say, while the large number of the party have been so understood, it has been questioned before and well known that there were many Democrats all through the States of the country who were opposed to any such revision; and it was by the free use of the party lash, as I understand it, that the great bulk of the Democratic party was whipped in, and only a very small minority now left who will not support the bill.

Mr. BYNUM. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania know that in all the Republican party platforms which have been disseminated throughout the country in former campaigns revenue reform was a party cry?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes; but revision not by a Democratic majority in the House of Representatives. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I want to say a word in reference to the election of my colleague, Mr. SCOTT. There were differences in that district inside of the Republican party, not upon this issue, but personal differences in some of the counties; and Mr. SCOTT was elected and re-elected, and I say it in no disparagement of him, for he is a most intelligent gentleman, a man of large experience in business matters, and fit intellectually and otherwise to be a member of Congress; but he could not be elected in that district upon this issue. He could be nominated by the Democratic party; but mark my words he will not accept that nomination. If he did he could not be elected in the new district in which he would have to run upon the issue of free trade.

Mr. BYNUM. We confess that we can not keep up with your gerrymandering.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. We do not gerrymander. Pennsylvania is free from that charge.

Mr. KERR. I am surprised to hear such a suggestion as that from a gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BYNUM. Let me say to the gentleman that Indiana, under a Democratic administration, has a fairer apportionment than it ever had before.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to proceed now for a little while longer. I have just got in the humor for it. I know it will give me a great deal of trouble to-night to revise all of these notes. A man had much better sit down and write out his speech upon the tariff question, and most other questions, than to have to wade through hundreds of pages of the excellent phonographic reports given to us by our reporters. But still as I have gone this far I want to add a few remarks to what I have already made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEAR. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I will remark here that it is a pretty warm day to be engaged in this sort of conflict in the House of Representatives. [Laughter.] But I want to give attention to the subject of protection in Pennsylvania, as it is looked upon there by both parties, Democratic and Republican. The protectionists of Pennsylvania represent the people of the whole State. I said a few moments ago, making the broad assertion that can not be contradicted, that no sitting member of this House could be elected upon the platform of free trade in that State. There were times when the Democratic party in our State thought they could change the current of popular sentiment, a good many years ago, perhaps before many of us were in mature life.

One Mr. Glancey Jones, one of the leaders of the Democratic party of Pennsylvania, nominated for Congress by the Democratic party in Berks County, which usually gave a majority there of about 8,000 for the Democratic party when they did not stop their counting, but anyhow about 8,000—Glancey Jones ran upon the free-trade platform. The Whigs did not make a nomination, but a Democratic protectionist by the name of Schwartz, a dear old German, ran on the protection ticket and was triumphantly elected.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Jones had been chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, too.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; Glancey Jones had been the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of a former Congress, and yet, notwithstanding that he ran in Berk's County, a thorough Democratic district, with the standing which his chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee gave him, as a Democrat he was beaten, absolutely beaten by a protectionist. He was defeated by quite a large majority, and Schwartz, the German protectionist, was elected. And I say it will be so in every instance with any man in Pennsylvania, running in any district, who runs upon the doctrines enunciated by President Cleveland in his message to Congress at the beginning of this session. That is the condition there to-day in all parts of the State.

The sentiment prevails all over the State, and will prevail. You know of the immense majority of 80,000 that we can give upon our Presidential ticket at a Presidential election. Our majority is an immense one, and it is a majority really of the people of Pennsylvania who feel that Republican administrations are for the benefit of the country and that Democratic administrations are not so.

I have said it privately, and I will say it here where we are talking face to face; I have said it on the stump and have said it otherwise—what a pity it is when the Government comes under the control of Democratic organizations anywhere, in Congress, in our Legislatures, in the Presidential office. When that comes about we never have progress; we go back. The Democratic party lives in its old ruts of bygone days. The Republican party is the only party of progress, and has been the only party of progress.

Mr. McMILLIN. Did we not build 12,000 miles of railroad in the past year?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The railroads which have been built in this country were stimulated by the existence of the Republican party in power.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to my friend from Pennsylvania that but for the lands squandered upon the Pacific roads we would not have lost the 190,000,000 of acres of land with which they were subsidized.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am not speaking of that. I have studied that matter and thought over it satisfactorily enough. You can not help a man making money. If money is his god he will make it wherever he goes and at every opportunity he has.

I do not know how the millionaire feels. I should think he feels very good and pleasant; free from care, or perhaps he is no freer of care than those of us who are not classed among that set of men. Yet I do not despise that man. He deserves some sympathy. He puts his capital into enterprises and takes his chances of loss or gain. Your railroads are built, your steam-ships are built, all manner of business enterprises are entered into, and the people at large are gainers by it and will continue to be gainers by it.

If we resume again, as I believe we can, a Republican administration of the Government, and have a Republican House of Representatives, as well as a Republican Senate, we will have an era of progress. I say this in all kindness as between man and man. The Democratic man to me is just as kindly and fair as the Republican man. But I say to them, "You do not seem to get out of the old ruts; you live in the past and not in the future; you attempt by legislation to throttle everything that is progressive; and worse than all you try to make the people believe in your speeches when you tell them that Republicanism is destructive to the progress of the country and the interests of the masses of the people."

But I believe those masses are intelligent, and they know just what we are doing here. They look to us, they watch us more than we may think they do. They see what is going on; and I feel sure when the contest comes a few months hence the intelligence and patriotism of the country will change the existing order of things here and in the White House.

I do not say this from an individual point of view. You gentlemen are pleasant, agreeable companions; I have found you to be so. But I want a Republican majority in the House of Representatives and a Republican President of the United States, with a Republican Senate, and we will then reform and revise the tariff and will make it so that it will be progressive; and I know the country will be glad and be prosperous under its benign influences. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor.

Mr. WEBER. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WEBER. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he disapproves of the building of the Pacific Railroads?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state to the gentleman that in due time all of the progress which has been accomplished would have been accomplished without the sacrifice of the land given to those railroads. I disapprove of that squandering of the public land. It was a crime when it was done and a disgrace when it was ended.

Mr. WEBER. Does the gentleman repudiate the doctrines of his party in 1864? And does he repudiate the doctrines of the leader of his party, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the last Congress, who was himself repudiated by the people of his district for attempting to force down the throats of our people the same policy the foundation of which is in this Mills bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. I deny the wisdom of a policy that put our vast public domain out of the reach of laborers and individual settlers and put it into the hands of monopolies. So far as the distinguished gentleman to whom I suppose the gentleman from New York refers is concerned, he is so bold and honest that no one who knows him would question his high standing.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] yielded the floor and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] was recognized, and all this is out of order.

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McMILLIN. I can not. I had not observed that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] had been recognized when I made my statement.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield a few moments to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat struck by the claim made by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], for whom I have the highest respect, in calling forth and bringing to view the alleged prosperity of Philadelphia as showing the favorable results of the high-tariff policy under which this country has labored for the last twenty-five years. To me, sir, the city of Philadelphia is an illustration on the other side. To me the condition of that city to-day is the best argument that can be made to show the baleful and pernicious effects of the very high tariff which now exists. Some ninety days ago I was in Philadelphia, passed through its streets, and remained there for some time.

From Philadelphia I went on to the city of New York, and the contrast was most striking. Here are two cities within 90 miles of each other, the one, New York, rapidly becoming the greatest commercial center in the world, the other, Philadelphia, which the gentleman spoke of as a city of a million inhabitants, but, if he will pardon me for saying it, what he calls the city of Philadelphia is not a city at all; it is nothing but a big, overgrown country village. [Laughter.] Philadelphia, from its natural situation and resources, might have grappled with the immense trade which has now gone to New York and the two cities might have been seen traveling along with each other hand in hand, equal competitors for that great commerce.

What is the reason that Philadelphia has failed in the race? Sir, it is because Philadelphia and the business men of that place have been fed upon the public pap and have been brought up to believe that the rest of the country should be taxed to support them. It is because they have not depended, as the citizens and business men of New York have depended, upon their own enterprise, their own thrift, their own frugality for the bettering of their condition. The people of the city of Philadelphia have not obeyed that injunction of the Bible which says, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread." If the people of Philadelphia had earned their own living in the old-fashioned way, it is my judgment that they would now be in a very different and very much better position.

Mr. NUTTING. I think the gentleman is entitled to the credit of being the first to discover the fact that the people of Philadelphia have not been industrious from the foundation of the city until now.

Mr. FORD. I did not say that, sir, but I will submit the question to any fair-minded and unprejudiced man. Let him go to that city of Philadelphia and look it all over, and then go from there to the city of New York, and let him say if he does not find that the contrast is something tremendous. Why, sir, it reminds me of a story I read the other day of two old friends who met after a long separation, and one said to the other, "Why, Tom, where have you been?" His friend replied, "I have been very sick, and the doctor has advised me to go to some quiet place, where I can lead a quiet and secluded life." "What have you done about it?" asked his friend. "Well," said the sick man, "I have gone into business in Philadelphia." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman must have made a very short visit in Philadelphia, and he must have had his eyes closed or he must have been under some remarkable influence which caused him not to want to see, because the contrast between the two cities is indeed very great, but it is entirely in favor of Philadelphia. [Laughter.] The city of New York is largely made up of foreign population. The importers, the capital of Great Britain is there, and hence there is a free-trade feeling in New York City which has been manifested heretofore by its representatives upon this floor, but, I am glad to say, not now.

I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] that the investments and the manufactures of Philadelphia amount to many more millions of dollars than like investments in New York, and New York concedes that. New York is a great seaport. It invites the foreign element and that element is there. New York is for free ships. It is the foreign element and the foreign influence in New York that makes against protection. The gentleman compares New York and Philadelphia. Why, sir, I spoke of Philadelphia as a city of homes; I spoke of its comforts for the people who live there. Did the gentleman travel over the 800 miles of its paved streets or the 400 miles of its street railways, and did he look into thousands and thousands of houses in which the poorer people of Philadelphia dwell?

You do not see many large houses in Philadelphia occupied by millionaires; you do not see much lavish or extravagant expenditure there, compared with New York, which I admit.

Mr. FORD. I spoke of the entire commerce of the city.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen will say how much time they want for this discussion I will try to accommodate them. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want only two minutes more. You know I gave you a good deal of time. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I only want to say this in defense of the city of Philadelphia: If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] had remained there long enough, or if I had come across him there (as I hope I may at some future day), I would have shown him what the greatness of Philadelphia is. [Laughter.]

The city of Philadelphia is great in everything that enters into the comfort of man; great in everything that enters into moderate living without luxury; great in everything that is domestic; great in everything that pertains to the comfort, and the intelligence, and the progress, and the welfare of her native and her Americanized population. I use these words "native" and "foreign" as descriptive, but it is well known that New York is in large measure a foreign city. It is influenced largely by foreign capital. It is the influence of foreign capital that makes the only street that gentlemen who visit that city, as my friend from Michigan probably did, generally the only one they go into—Broadway. My friend does see a great crowd in New York struggling to make their way, but he will find upon close inspection that one out of every two men that he sees is a foreigner or surrounded by foreign influences.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, I say with great pleasure that there are now Representatives in this Hall from the city of New York who are in favor of the protective system. Formerly it used to be the rule that the delegation from New York City was almost entirely in the interest of free trade. But now, let me say to the gentleman from Michigan again, that if he wants a comfortable life combined with the pursuits of legitimate business let him come to Philadelphia. [Laughter.] No man can be idle in Philadelphia. There are no idlers there. Everybody is occupied in making a living for himself and his family. The people of Philadelphia lead a life of domestic happiness and also a life of great business industry, and they heap up in the aggregate more capital than the American-born people of the city of New York do.

Mr. LAIRD. Tell them about John Wanamaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, John Wanamaker. I am glad you have mentioned his honored name. I will speak of Mr. Wanamaker, who is a distinguished constituent of mine, one of the gentlemen I am proud to have the honor of representing upon this floor, a man of great enterprise. And, Mr. Chairman, our city is full of men of enterprise, and let me say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORD], who undertakes to draw a comparision here between the city of New York and the city of Philadelphia, that I hope before he undertakes to make any other such comparison he will visit Philadelphia and come along with me and I will show him what that city is. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has had sufficient time to give the statistics of Philadelphia and do justice to its attractions [laughter], and I should like to extend his time, only that that would not leave me any for myself. There is a story current in Boston that a Philadelphian visiting there was very much annoyed by the crookedness of the streets, and remarked rather petulantly to his Boston friend that he wished Boston was "laid out in the same manner as Philadelphia," to which the Bostonian replied: "When Boston is as dead as Philadelphia we will have her 'laid out' in the same way." [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That is very good, very good.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has also declared here that in the next Presidential election they will have a majority of nearly all, I think he said, of the voters of the State of Pennsylvania against the free-trade doctrine of the Democratic party. I would caution the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to have that majority larger than the number of legal voters.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is not usual in the Republican party. We can show you a great many cases in your own party, however, where that condition of facts is true.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. But you can not show us that in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No; the State of Pennsylvania is a Republican State.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; it can not be said of the State of Pennsylvania, for it is the great boast in the city of Philadelphia, on both sides of politics, that they have honest elections there. We have laws which will prevent, in my opinion, any dishonest elections. We have laws there for the protection of elections, which are carried out and which will go to the extent even of preventing frauds at delegate elections. Those laws in the city of Philadelphia are rigidly enforced, and the result is honest elections. Besides that, we have not in the city of Philadelphia what you have in Boston—and that is such men as John L. Sullivan, as my friend from Boston has in that city; and it is also true that while John L. Sullivan may be needed in the city of Boston, such men are not needed in the city of Philadelphia. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred to the State of Massachusetts as a Commonwealth where wages of the laboring men are higher than, perhaps, they are in any other place in the world. In the interrpution which I made in the current of his remarks I said that that was so, because not one in ten of the industries of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts were among the protected industries; and since I spoke I have been kindly handed by a friend a list of the wages paid in the State of Massachusetts and the wages paid in Great Britain in the cotton-spinning districts—and the cotton industry, Mr. Chairman, is the largest industry in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and it is protected by a tariff to the extent of 50 per cent.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Maine should at least permit me to get a start.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman was very exuberant in asking questions when the gentleman from Pennsylvania was upon the floor, but he does not seem to be willing now to allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] is the very first man on your side to get out of the strict line of written speeches. He is the first one who, instead of reading off a written speech seemingly prepared or revised by the central bureau here, has gone into a discussion of the real questions involved in the bill now before the House. And the questions which were propounded to him were invited by himself.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly was not prepared with a written speech, and he seemed to be well able to take care of himself.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I regret I was not able, like the gentlemen who have preceded me, to have written out what I would like to say on the pending question of the tariff. If I had been able to do so, I would perhaps have taken much more trouble than I have done; but what I have had to say on this question I have said, and I have freely expressed the conviction of my mind.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I acknowledge, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, it is a great deal safer to write out your remarks and to consider them beforehand; and I am quite sure if he had followed that rule on the present occasion there are some things that he has said about the Mills bill which he would have omitted, because they seem to show he has not read that bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, I have read it, and I have reread it, and I understand the disastrous results it will work to the laboring men and industrial interests in this country; and it is because I do understand it in detail and in the aggregate that I have expressed myself so strongly against it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. But to proceed with my remarks at the point where I was interrupted, as to the cotton-spinning industry in the State of Massachusetts, which is protected, as I have already stated, by a duty of 50 per cent., I wish to state what are the wages paid in the State of Massachusetts, where this industry is protected, and the wages paid in Great Britain.

In England in the cotton-spinning district laborers are paid 75 cents a day. In Massachusetts they are paid 92 cents a day. Spinners are paid $1.48 in England, and in Massachusetts they are paid $1.65. Weavers in Great Britain are paid 90 cents, and in Massachusetts they are paid 95 cents. This is all the difference there is between the laborers in the cotton-spinning industry in Massachusetts and England, and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is the most favored portion of the United States so far as laboring men are concerned, engaged in these protected industries.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not true they work more hours in Massachusetts than in England?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. They work more hours during the week up there in Massachusetts than in England.

Mr. FORAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. FORAN. If England pays such wages as compared with us, why is it that thousands and thousands are flocking to our shores every year from that country?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am not aware that they are flocking to Massachusetts and crowding our cotton mills.

Mr. FORAN. Thousands upon thousands come every year.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. They may do so; but they are not crowding your "paradise of cotton-spinners," which the gentleman from Pennsylvania said Massachusetts was.

Mr. NUTTING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I want to get in something else myself, and I must decline to yield further.

Mr. NUTTING. But it is something that you ought to answer.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Very well; go on.

Mr. NUTTING. Last year—the very last year—the immigration from England to this country was 45,696——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I must say to the gentleman from New York that I am talking of the wages in Massachusetts as compared with the wages in England; not the wages in New York or in Michigan.

Mr. NUTTING. I know; but allow me to complete my question. The immigration from England to this country last year was 45,696, and from Ireland to this country last year it was 56,860.

Now, will the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House why it is, if free trade in Great Britain has been conducive to the benefit of the laboring people, that these great numbers have come to this protected country?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from New York understands that we have advantages in this country other than those which are secured by a 47.10 per cent. on some kinds of raw material and manufactured goods.

Mr. NUTTING. That is no answer.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Have we not republican institutions, free schools, free lands, good soil, a genial climate, and all conditions conducive to the wealth of the agricultural classes? The better part of the continent is ours, to which we may welcome the landless men of all the world; these are advantages that, to my mind, lure immigrants to our shores, not our system of taxation; that rather repels them.

But the point to which I return is a comparison of the wages of labor between Massachusetts and England, and I have here stated that the high tariff——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman from Massachusetts read Carroll D. Wright's statement?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I have his latest report here.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Well, read it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. And I appeal from Carroll D. Wright to Carroll D. Wright.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The statement of the chief statistician of Massachusetts ought to be entitled to some weight with Massachusetts people.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I have matter here from Mr. Wright so recent that it has not even been put in type, there not being sufficient time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not know if the gentleman representing the statistical bureau of Massachusetts is not good authority to quote upon this point. I should be very sorry to think that he had sent something here which was not reliable, and if so it is a most remarkable thing coming from a Massachusetts man.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Well, you must settle that with Mr. Wright. His statistics, I wish to say, are of the very highest character and reliability, and I have just read from them.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman seems disinclined to allude to them, although I understand that they are sent here to furnish reliable intelligence for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, to show the effect of taxation on Massachusetts industries, I wish to refer to another industry, a comparatively unprotected industry, which is the second in importance and volume in the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and I refer to the boot and shoe industry. That is an industry which pays the highest wages which are paid in any part of New England to manufacturing operatives.

This is well known to every man in this House who has studied the questions that we should discuss in this debate. These operatives are moreover men of a high grade of intelligence; they are the frugal, high-taxed, unprotected mechanics that add to the immense deposits of our savings banks. The nominal duty on boots and shoes is about 30 per cent., and I believe that if that duty were taken off, and I say this with a full knowledge of my responsibility to a district containing more boot and shoe manufactories than any other in this country outside of Massachusetts—that if that duty of 30 per cent. was taken off and similar duties were taken off of the articles entering into the manufacture of boots and shoes my people would be better off to-day and would be able to still further increase the wages of their employés.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Why has the gentleman read the memorials presented here in reference to the morocco manufacturing industries?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am not talking of morocco now, but of boots and shoes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman can not have read the facts in connection with morocco and leather——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I can not yield to the gentleman further. He has had his time. The gentleman can show up the Pennsylvania industries, but I am now talking of Massachusetts. Morocco and leather are the raw materials of boot and shoe makers.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I know; but I want the gentleman to read the matter which has been presented here through the petition-box, especially calling attention to the morocco manufacturers and those dealing in leather, and he will see how they would suffer under this Mills bill.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I know that if we go to the petition-box for information I am sure we shall find it very unsatisfactory, for I have put many petitions in there myself that I should be sorry to agree with.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman has read everything that he has put in. I think it is the duty of a representative of the people to do that. I regret very much that we were shut out from getting at the Committee on Ways and Means, for I should like to have read many petitions that came to me from men in all branches of trade who are opposed to the Mills bill. I think they would have illuminated my friends from Indiana and Kentucky.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I now wish to give——

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. If I can get the floor for a few minutes——

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question relating to the shoe industry.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I will answer a question as to the shoe industry, but not as to the leather industry, at this time.

Mr. BAYNE. I want the gentleman to stick to the logic of his position. I did not hear the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], but I am told that he said the wages paid to the workers in the shoe factory in Massachusetts were almost double the wages paid to the same class of workmen in England——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. And that the price of a pair of shoes in Massachusetts was less than in England.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. It may be that the cost of a pair of shoes of some kinds would be cheaper in England than in Massachusetts.

Mr. BAYNE. The statement was general with reference to the shoe industry, as I understood it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Why then did not the gentleman ask the gentleman from Texas himself some questions at the time?

Mr. BAYNE. I did not hear it, but I learned that was the statement.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am not answering questions as to the speech of the leader of the Democratic party on this side. He spoke for us in tones that will be heard all over the country, and he vindicated himself as the choice of the Speaker and of the Democratic party at the same time. [Applause.] I rejoice in his speech, and will stand by it as far as I heard it and understood it.

I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that there is plant enough in the State of Massachusetts to supply every part of the United States with boots and shoes. We own 53 per cent. of the boot and shoe machinery in the United States. Statistics show that that machinery is run from two-thirds to three-fourths of the year because the market is too limited; but if it were run through the year to its full capacity we could supply all the people of the United States with all the boots and shoes they can use.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not want any gentleman to be left under the wrong idea that this shoe industry is only in Massachusetts; it is very extensive, also, in Philadelphia.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I did not say it was confined to Massachusetts. I admit that Philadelphia has almost everything there is.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Almost everything that is made by man is made there and will be so long as we have protection to American industry.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. And all is sold at John Wanamaker's. [Laughter.] I heard the gentleman say so awhile ago.

But I do not want to be driven away from this boot and shoe business. It is the largest business in my district.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. We have the same class of manufactures in my district.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The reason why that industry has so prospered is because it has experienced some of the salutary neglect of the Government. It has never appeared here asking for higher duties. You can not find a time in the history of Congress when the Massachusetts boot and shoe makers have been here asking for high tariffs. They have flourished in spite of the tariffs.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you think that industry would flourish better if there were no duty at all?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. In reply to the gentleman I will say, if you will allow me to take the duty off the articles used in the production of the better class of boots and shoes made there I would be willing to put boots and shoes on the free-list.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you think it would be wise to do so?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I say, upon the condition I have stated, I would be glad to see that done; and I say it without any reservation whatsoever.

I think so because we have experience in that trade to prove the good effect of raw material. In 1871, there being then a Republican Congress who talked of their care for the interests of the farmers and laborers of the country just as we hear so much of that talk here to-day, the importers and manufacturers and the tanners of the country came to Congress and had the hides, which were largely imported from South America, put on the free-list.

There was nobody to protest against it. If protection ever helps anybody, that made a difference to every farmer in this country; it made a difference upon every ox, upon every steer of full growth, of possibly $1. Hides were brought into this country in enormous quantities, and the result was that whereas in 1870 or 1871 we had exported less than 2,000,000 pounds of sole-leather, within two or three years from that time—I will not be exact in my statement of time—the exports of sole-leather rose to 11,000,000 pounds, and in 1883 the tanners of this country were shipping abroad 34,000,000 pounds of sole-leather in one year. That is a raw material of the boot and shoe industry, and it is upon that raw material that that great industry, the second of the great industries of Massachusetts, stands to-day, and we want wool put in the same category. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Oh, the gentleman probably rises to ask me if I am willing that the farmers should suffer this great loss upon their hides.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No; I was not going to ask that question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Ah, you were; I know you were; but, Mr. Chairman, they did not lose it. They lost the tax which might have been exacted from the American people in that way, but they made it up ten times over in the increased prosperity of the country.

Mr. MILLIKEN. My question is: Did the consumers get their boots and shoes any cheaper for hides being put on the free-list?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. No doubt they did.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman and I do not agree about that.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. There is no article of common consumption to-day in this country that is so good, so handsomely made, and so cheap to the consumer as boots and shoes, and that is because the boot and shoe industry is the least taxed, the least burdened, the least hampered of all our great manufacturing industries.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does my friend think that would be true of the other manufactures in this country?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am willing to try it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am not so fearful as to the results of good doctrine as some gentlemen on the other side are. I am perfectly willing to try the experiment; especially in the matter of wool. I do not know why the farmer should have a tax in his favor upon wool if he can not have it on hides. If it is due to him upon wool it is due to him upon hides, and let us see you put hides back on the tariff list! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. How about the manufactures of wool?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am not talking about that, but I may talk about it presently if my time holds out, in spite of all these interruptions. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said on this floor about "pauper labor" and about the workingmen of New England—of Massachusetts, for instance—being unable to compete with it.

Sir, I scorn that argument. My people can compete with the labor of any part of the world if they have a free field. Let me give you an instance in our boot and shoe industry which will prove that. A few years ago one of the great inventors of the State of Massachusetts, one of the makers of those magnificent automatic machines that play so great a part in the manufactures of our day, invented and took out letters patent all over the world for sewing and heeling machines which turned out the handsomest boots and shoes that can be made. The proprietors of those machines did not choose to sell them directly to the manufacturers; they preferred to lease them, their use being paid for by a royalty upon each boot or shoe sewed on them, the number being indicated by a device which registered it upon the machine itself.

After that machine was started in this country they went over to Europe with it and introduced it into the great boot and shoe manufacturing establishments not only of Great Britain, but also of Germany, and at the end of the year they were very much surprised to find that their royalties from the machines in use in England reached only 47 per cent. of what they collected in the State of Massachusetts. They were alarmed and suspicious. They knew that from the accurate construction of the machine and the certainty of its registering power it could not tell any lie about its own work; so they sent over one of the ablest men in Massachusetts in the examination of patent matters to investigate.

He came back and told them that they were getting an honest return from the foreign boot and shoe manufacturers, and that the explanation was that the best labor of England could not produce with those machines more than 47 per cent. of the amount of work that was produced by the Massachusetts operatives upon the same machine. That meant that the American mechanic, with his enterprise and his ambition, standing at those machines worked more hours a day at a greater rate of speed than did the "pauper labor," as it is called, of Great Britain; it meant that the Englishman quit work on Saturday afternoon and did not come back to work until Tuesday morning; it meant that he would not work as many hours or stand to his work as well as the Massachusetts workman, and there is the whole difference between "pauper labor" and free labor.

Mr. MILLIKEN. One more question; I know a Massachusetts man will not refuse me that privilege.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend states that the boot and shoe industry of Massachusetts is flourishing, and that the boot and shoe men of Massachusetts are able to sell shoes cheap because their industry has been poorly protected.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. No, I did not put it in that way; not because they have been "poorly protected," but because the business has not been highly taxed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend says, also, that the cotton industry of this country is taxed to the extent of 50 per cent. Now, is it not true that the cotton mills of Massachusetts are selling their product of all the grades of coarser cotton to-day as cheap as the English manufacturers are selling, or cheaper?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Probably they are.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yet that cotton industry has been protected.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Well, that result does not come from protection, because it was before they were protected that they did it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Oh, no.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Do you say no?

Mr. MILLIKEN. When were they not protected, and how long have they been doing that?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I say before they were protected.

Mr. Chairman, I have learned from the gentlemen on the other side of the House that the whole prosperity of the country in which we live is due to the fact that in 1861 we had a war which wasted untold millions of property and hundreds of thousands of lives, because from that confusion and destruction there arose safety for the nation in our tariff of 47.10 per cent. That was the great result of the war. It came to us very much as the Chinaman's discovery of roast pig. His house was burned up, but in the ashes he discovered a pig that had been accidentally roasted, and that discovery made up to him for all the rest of the destruction. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, this tariff of ours bears about the same relation to the prosperity of this country as that roast pig bore to the conflagration in which he was produced. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have heard that old story a great many times; but I want to say to my friend that no one on this side claims that the prosperity of this country grew out of that great war.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I have heard it repeatedly stated on the floor of this House that the prosperity of this country was due to a tariff of 47.10 per cent. Every man here has heard it. I have heard it a dozen times in one speech to-day. There has not been a speech written on that side of the House that has not contained that proposition in one form or other. It is the one string upon which everything on that side is strung, and the fact that it is proposed to reduce that tariff raises a shout of "free trade" from you gentlemen all over the country. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have satisfied the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] in regard to his question, I will take up another point.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am always satisfied with the gentleman, even though he fails to convince me, because I like him.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman from Maine. I am very glad we have such reciprocal kindness here. This is the politest House I ever knew. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the House declare that the whole prosperity of this country is founded upon the tariff of 47.10 per cent., and, so far as I understand their position, they will not agree that one jot or tittle of what they call "protection" in that regard shall be touched or taken away. That was not the feeling of our people in old times, when the cotton manufacturing industries of Massachusetts were established. It was not the feeling of the House of Representatives when it came to deal with the question of a great surplus in 1856.

We were then living under a tariff averaging 28 per cent., the tariff of 1846, which was made by the greatest financier that this country had seen since Alexander Hamilton. I mean Robert J. Walker. He was not from Arkansas; he was not from Texas; he was not from Kentucky; but he happened to be from Mississippi, and yet the tariff which the Mississippian made brought prosperity to the country. So we may be permitted to hope that a tariff made in part by a Texan [Mr. MILLS] may produce the same result. But, Mr. Chairman, in 1857, when the country had a large surplus and we were living under a tariff of 28 per cent., the manufacturers of New England, and especially of Massachusetts, came to this House and asked for a reduction of the tariff. That reduction was 21 per cent., and if the gentleman from Maine will look back at the record of that time he will see nine members of Congress, the whole delegation in this House, and the two Senators voted with the solid South to reduce that to 21 per cent. I regret they were not followed by all of New England.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And it produced the panic of 1857.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. A panic does not follow on the heels of a tariff. If it were, the panic of 1857 would have been postponed to 1858, while the panic of 1873 was brought about by the 50 per cent.——

Mr. MILLIKEN. They discovered that in the North.

Mr. FARQUHAR. What was the condition of the United States Treasury when they got through with the Walker tariff?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. What has that to do with the question of the reduction of the tariff? I am not dealing with the Treasury in the last hours of Mr. Buchanan's administration, but I am dealing with the Treasury of the United States now and to-day; and it is a pretty severe problem. In 1871 the Treasury showed pretty much the same condition we have to-day. There was a surplus of $100,000,000. Under the administration of General Grant the President repeatedly advised the reduction of the tariff, and no man howled free trade when he made such recommendations to Congress.

What did the House do at that time? What did the Republican party in charge of the affairs of Congress at that time do? Did they pass a bill in favor of cheap whisky and cheap tobacco? Did they pass a tariff taking off revenue taxes and leaving all the taxes on the common articles of consumption? No, Mr. Chairman, not a bit of it; but they passed a bill to reduce the tariff, and they did reduce the tariff under the lead of another Massachusetts man, Mr. DAWES, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who brought in a bill similar to that which you laughed away from the doors of the House when proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means by its chairman, Mr. Morrison, a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to ask the gentleman a pertinent question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. BAYNE. I suppose it was the tariff of 1846 which the gentleman approved.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, I do approve of it.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, the tariff of 1846 provided for a reduction of duty. If you will examine the report made by the Ways and Means Committee you will see that the reduction of duty in that tariff was made for the purpose of increasing the revenue, because there was a deficit in the Treasury year after year, and it was increasing year by year until a large indebtedness on the part of the Government was imminent. Now, the tariff is proposed to be reduced in order to do away with the surplus in the Treasury. In the one instance the tariff was reduced for the purpose of increasing the revenue, while in the other the tariff is to be reduced for the purpose of reducing the surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Why does the gentleman quote the tariff of 1846? Why does he not speak of the tariff of 1871, of which I was talking?

Mr. BAYNE. You spoke of the tariff of 1846, and I am referring to your remarks.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, I spoke of the tariff of 1846 as one under which many of the great manufacturing industries of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to state the matter as I understand it?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. Are not the positions which I have stated utterly antagonistic to one another? In the tariff of 1846, according to the gentleman, there was a reduction to increase the revenue, and here it is proposed to reduce the tariff to reduce the surplus.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. That is a question of opinion.

Mr. BAYNE. The reduction in 1846 was to increase importations and to increase the revenue in the Treasury.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. That was not the case in 1857; it was to reduce taxes.

Mr. BAYNE. I say in 1846. Now you propose to reduce the duties for the purpose of diminishing the surplus, when the tariff was reduced in 1846 on your statement for the purpose of increasing the receipts of the Treasury.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. We propose now to reduce the ratio of duties, first, by an extension of the free-list, and second, by such means as we may find convenient. We are going in the same track as our predecessors followed in 1857 and 1871; and the gentleman may take his own time to explain why it was that in 1871 the whole Republican party reduced the tariff without saying a word about the substitution of free whisky and free tobacco, that enormous burden that the gentleman from Iowa spoke of as crushing the laboring people this morning.

Mr. BREWER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? Does he not know that President Buchanan in his message on the 8th of December, 1857, stated that Congress would have to make a loan in order to conduct the affairs of the Government?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. When the tariff bill was under discussion, you mean, in 1857?

Mr. BREWER. I am talking of Mr. Buchanan's administration—his message to Congress in December, 1857.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am not discussing the messages of Presidents or the proclamations of Mr. Buchanan, but I am discussing how a sensible Congress under the lead of the Republican party fully arose to the occasion and passed a tariff bill, whereas the Republicans of the present Congress, preceding a quadrennial election, respond to the party lash and raise a cry against any revision. But I do not know that good judgment can be expected when the party stands committed to one idea, on which they are to elect a President, or go on in the paralyzed condition they have been in since 1884.

Mr. BAYNE. But since 1846 the Democratic party has changed its position on the tariff.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The Democratic party of 1846 was neither the gentleman's party nor mine. I am one of those men whose face turns towards the morning; and I believe the Democratic party will have plenty of opportunity to revise the tariff by Democratic administrations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, to whom a thousand years seems as but yesterday [laughter and applause], said a few moments ago he proposed to put this off, this legislation, until the Republican party had charge of the House and had its own President in the White House.

Mr. Chairman, such a suggestion as that appalls me in view of our present taxes. [Laughter.] No man living, no one here present, will join in the acclaim which will welcome a Republican administration nto the White House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to put in an item of history just here, since the gentleman has been quoting history. In the State of Pennsylvania, in the campaign of 1846, the cry of the Democratic party, and it was incorporated in all Democratic literature and inscribed on their banners in every State, was "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842."

It was that pretense by which we lost ground in Pennsylvania then, for it was only a pretense—Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842—and we were betrayed.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am sorry the gentleman was betrayed, but perhaps it was better for the country.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I refer to this because I happened to be a law student in the office of one of these gentlemen at the time, and esteemed him personally as a most excellent gentleman—George M. Dallas—and regretted, I remember very well, that I could not separate the vote, and vote for him for Vice-President on personal grounds and for the opposing candidate for President. But in the State of Pennsylvania the Democratic party, shrinking from the courage they had generally shown, advocated all over the State the tariff of 1842—Polk and Dallas and the tariff of 1842—and by that false pretense won.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That was the old Democratic party.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That was the old Democracy, the real Democracy, made up altogether of Democrats.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I did not expect to start these painful reminiscenses, and to hear the wails of Pennsylvania over the tariff of 1842.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But I only wanted to give a little history, as the gentleman was quoting from history, and I wanted him to understand that they got in on a false pretense throughout the country in that election.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I would like to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania tell the House, if he can, how his State would have got along if it had not been for the war that raised the tariff to 47.10 per cent.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will make a general answer that perhaps——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Well, if the gentleman is going to make a general answer, perhaps I had better sit down.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. In one minute I can make it. I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that I recollect very well when Robert J. Walker was made Secretary of the Treasury, and well remember also his report on the tariff. I think it took the country by surprise; and I think it was soon determined that it was the most impracticable tariff programme that was ever enunciated by any statesman in this country. It was an utter failure to produce the results expected to be produced by it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit an interruption?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I can not yield to so many Pennsylvanians. One Pennsylvanian at a time is quite enough.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to give you a fact bearing on the tariff of 1857.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I do not want any, for I was there. I was not a tariff reformer in 1844, but I was in 1857. When gentlemen go back into the cloudy region of 1840 and 1842 I confess I am compelled to listen without being able to contribute anything to it from personal knowledge.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman's party got there by putting the country in a sort of a cloud.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. But when you come to 1857, I will say I saw it all; I was part of it, and remember it well. Let me say a word about that tariff of 1846, and refer again to what the gentleman from Maine said as to the rise of the manufacturing industries in the State of Massachusetts. I will say to him, it was under those more honest and lower tariffs that the great manufacturing interests of Massachusetts arose.

Mr. MILLIKEN rose.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will pardon me a moment. The great manufacturing cities of Massachusetts are well known by name. The first of them perhaps in order was Waltham. Then came on Lowell, Lawrence, and Holyoke, where my colleague [Mr. WHITING] lives and flourishes under this tariff. He has been here looking out for his interests. And not only Holyoke, but go up into the northern New England States to Manchester and to Lewiston, in the State of Maine; all those cities grew up under low tariffs. They became famous all over the world under those low tariffs. And if to-day under this tariff of 47 or 48 per cent. a syndicate of capitalists were to be called together to build up a new manufacturing city they would be laughed at, and the probate court would be applied to to put them under guardianship in order to save their money. There is not a point in New England to-day for building up a great manufacturing city.

I acknowledge that the city of Holyoke since that time has made a large success in some of the minor articles of manufacture, especially in the paper industry.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts. Has not Holyoke grown up entirely almost since the tariff of 1861?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Holyoke was one of the last established manufacturing cities of Massachusetts. It was built by the great dam that held the Connecticut River. Under the tariff of 1846 the plant was laid there, the canal was blasted out in the solid rock on the side of the Connecticut, and the great industries of that place were made possible under the Robert J. Walker tariff.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts. Does my colleague not know that the dam was built in 1850?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Which dam? The first dam I know was built before 1850. It was under the Robert J. Walker tariff.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts. But the dam was made and the mills built. But the people who put their money in it never got a dollar out of it. The stock sold for almost nothing. And there never was a spark of prosperity in Holyoke until the tariff of 1861. For five or six years Holyoke did not grow at all.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I wish the gentleman had told the whole story. As he has told so much of it I will tell the other part. I fully acknowledge that the city of Holyoke, which I knew before there was a factory there, was started about 1848 with such defective engineering that the whole concern went down the river from the fact that the engineers did not know how to found their works. New capital had to be put in, and some years elapsed before the town got a fair start. My knowledge of the manufacturing interests of the State of Massachusetts is fairly complete, and I believe my colleague will acknowledge that I am correct in what I have stated about the city of Holyoke.

But how was it with those other great cities? Were they not built under those low tariffs? I say they were, and I do so in the light of the past history of Massachusetts. That State is not here to-day asking for these high tariffs.

Mr. MILLIKEN. As the gentleman has spoken of Maine, will he allow me a question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will say nothing as to when Holyoke was dammed or how it was blessed afterwards. But my question is, does the gentleman not know that the manufactures of Maine have increased a great deal—more since the tariff of 1861 than ever before? And is that not also true of the gentleman's own State, and of the whole country?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. There are many parts of Massachusetts, as is notably the case in my own district, where there were towns largely engaged in manufacturing, having an abundant capital, where there is not a mill that has been built since the war. Where there have been fires the mills have not been rebuilt, and every woolen mill destroyed in that way means so many sets of woolen machinery out of the way, and no man to-day would rebuild them.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is not true of Maine.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Well, Maine may have got the "pull" over Massachusetts under this tariff. I do not know but she has. She certainly has developed the great apostle of high protection who soon will be your candidate for President.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And he will be elected, too.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. We will see.

Mr. BYNUM. You will have to do better than you did before.

Mr. MILLIKEN. We will not have to do much better.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy the time of the committee much longer, because I would rather give general information than special instruction.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman permit one question or suggestion? I did not mean to confine my observation to the tariff of 1846. The gentleman says he knew how it was in 1857 in Massachusetts, and asks how it was in Pennsylvania. The industries of Pennsylvania were utterly paralyzed in 1857.

Mr. FARQUHAR. So were they all over the country.

Mr. BAYNE. In Pennsylvania the operators were not only not earning wages, but in many of the large manufacturing centers they had to be supplied by public charity.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. So they ought to be now in the coal regions. You have got regions in Pennsylvania to-day that are a disgrace to humanity because of their miserable, wretched, starving working people. Why, it is only within a year or two that your Legislature had to forbid that miserable, half-naked Hungarian women should longer stand drawing the furnace fires. It was a public scandal. Pennsylvania has been the mother of monopoly and the step-mother of labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. Now, I ask my friend to pause one moment there. Let me tell him that the wages paid in Pennsylvania are larger than the wages paid in any other State in the Union. In my own county of Allegheny, which is only one county in Pennsylvania, the wages paid are greater in the aggregate than the wages paid by the whole number of States represented by the Southern members of the Ways and Means Committee of this House who framed this tariff bill.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. That may be so, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman whether the Edgar Thomson Iron Works are in Allegheny County?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is that the place where I read the other day that a lot of Pinkerton's detectives were guarding a detachment of Hungarians who were going in to work in those mills while the native workmen were out on a strike?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir; and I suppose the State of Kentucky and some other State are two States of the Union where the Hatfield gang crossed the line and committed several murders, but I do not hold the gentleman from Kentucky nor the people of Kentucky responsible for that any more than the gentleman should hold the State of Pennsylvania or me responsible for the difference between the employers and employés at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works.

I repeat that the aggregate wages paid in that one county of Allegheny is more than the entire amount of wages paid in the States of Kentucky, Arkansas, Texas, and all the States represented by the Southern contingent on the Ways and Means Committee of this House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The fact which I desired to bring out was that the concrete representation of the protective system in Allegheny County at present was a guard of Pinkerton detectives at the Edgar Thomson Iron Works protecting a lot of Hungarian immigrants who were going in there to work, while the native American workmen on a strike were, at the point of the gun and the revolver, kept out. That is the concrete picture of the condition of wages and of labor in the county of Allegheny, Pennsylvania, to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the blessing which the gentleman boasts of possessing over and above all other States and countries.

Mr. BAYNE. That is a mistaken statement of the facts and the gentleman from Kentucky does not understand the situation.

Mr. McMILLIN. Are they not there?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That was the question I asked the gentleman, and he said that the Edgar Thomson Iron Works were in the county of Allegheny. I put the question to the gentleman and he so responded.

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, no. The gentleman will find that I am one of those witnesses who understand their rights and who will protect themselves.

Mr. McMILLIN. How about the Carnegie works?

A MEMBER. That is the same place.

Mr. BAYNE. There is a difference between the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their workmen, and some Pinkerton detectives are there, I believe; but the men they are there to protect are not the Hungarian laborers, but skilled operatives brought from abroad to take the place of the union men who are on a strike. The effort of the Edgar Thomson Works now is to employ skilled labor which does not belong to the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, and the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, who are the only persons that could interfere in any employment that might be given to those people, have no concern whatever with the Hungarians. In fact, there are very few Hungarians there; and when the gentleman from Kentucky says that this is a controversy between the Hungarian and the American laborer, he misapprehends altogether the facts of the case.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I did not say that the controversy was between the Hungarian and the American laborer. I originally asked the gentleman whether the Edgar Thomson Steel Works were in his county at Allegheny, and he said they were. I then asked him if that was the place in regard to which I had seen a statement in the papers recently that a gang of Pinkerton detectives were in charge of the works and protecting a lot of Hungarian laborers who were going to work there while the native American workpeople were kept out on a strike, and the gentleman said yes.

Mr. BAYNE. I did not say that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I so understood the gentleman, but the RECORD will show what he did say.

Mr. REED (to Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky). Hold him down to it! You will convince the jury that you are now addressing. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Maine, of course, seeks to make a diversion from the point between myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], but I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] will agree with me that he is able to take care of himself without re-enforcement from the State of Maine.

I know nothing about the matter, except from the public press. I think the report was that there was a dispute there, not between the Hungarians and the native workmen, but between the owners of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their workmen, which dispute had resulted in the works being guarded, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] now says, by "some" of the Pinkerton detectives, for the purpose of protecting a lot of Hungarian laborers who were to be employed, while the workmen who had been employed there were out on a strike, and were kept out by force. Whatever the facts are, they will undoubtedly come out. What I asked was whether that was—whether this had taken place in the county of Allegheny, which the gentleman had thrown into the controversy and put forward here as paying more wages than certain other States which he indicated, and I further said that if that was the concrete form which the beneficent results of the protective system took, I, for one, thought that concrete form ought to be known to the American people.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say that I did not assent in any sense to the proposition that there was a controversy between the Hungarian laborers and the workmen who had been in the employ of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works. There has been and is a controversy between the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their skilled employés, who belong to the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers. They differed as to the rate of wages that should be paid for the ensuing year. The Edgar Thomson Works made several propositions to the members of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, none of which were accepted by the Association, and the Edgar Thomson Works then concluded to start up their mill with non-union men, but those non-union men are not Hungarians. The Hungarians are not skilled mechanics.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And there are none of them there?

Mr. BAYNE. There may be some of them there doing drudgery about the mills, but they do not belong to the force that operate in the mills. They are not skilled mechanics, and are not capable of doing at all the work which the Edgar Thomson mills require to be done.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman know what was the average per diem wages of the men who are out on strike?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know exactly what it was but I have no doubt that the average wages would run as high as $3 per day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I see it stated, but I do not know whether it is true or not, that the average of Pinkerton's detectives is $8 a day.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a fair example of the method of argument which is sometimes adopted on this subject. First, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], in his best manner, draws a picture which leaves the American workman under the protection of Pinkerton's detectives, and then he wishes to know if this is the final result of the protective system. What is this final result he talks about? Why, an incident in the great dispute which goes on whether under protection or under free trade——

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I deny that.

Mr. REED. Between employer and workingman as to what shall be the division of the results of the union of labor and capital. And he talks about that question as being the result, and then wants to contrast the wages of men temporarily employed with the general wages.

Now, I do think it ought to be pointed out such methods of arguing this question of free trade or protection are somewhat petty in their nature. The great question is, which system on the whole secures greater wealth for the country and higher wages for the workingmen? When the workingmen organized and presented themselves before the Committee on Ways and Means of a preceding Congress, the Committee on Ways and Means were more respectful to them than the present one, because the workingmen were allowed to appear and present their case. The question was asked, "Do you get the benefit of the tariff? Do they not try to prevent you getting the benefit of it?" And they responded with perfect frankness, "This is a quarrel between ourselves; you furnish us with the market, furnish us with the chance to work, and we will take care we will get our share." And I believe they will. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The county of Allegheny, in the State of Pennsylvania, was held up in contrast with the condition of a number of States. Its condition was depicted as being the very acme of protective development. The statement I made, the gentleman says, is an incident of the last industrial development in that county. I deny that it is an incident, and say that it is the necessary consequence of an unnatural system, one of the elements of which is that an organized body of armed detectives must be ready for use in guarding and protecting American labor; that it is a necessary symptom of the system which it defends.

What the gentleman says of the Ways and Means Committee, either in the present Congress or the last one, I treat with the contempt which it deserves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. It is always the custom when there has been a fair discussion of the actual situation and a fair description of the action of a set of men—it is always the nature of those who are not sufficiently skilled in parliamentary language to express their feelings, to use language which is not so. [Applause on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. So far as the language I uttered is unparliamentary I retract it, but that it is true and deserved there is no doubt. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the statement repeated in the last remark made by the gentleman from Kentucky, that detectives were employed to protect labor, was substantially a statement that detectives were employed to protect Hungarian labor, when the fact is that no detectives are employed to protect Hungarian labor, but the protection sought is for the skilled laborers who are American workingmen. Although some of them are foreigners by birth, yet all are citizens of the United States, while the Hungarian laborers are not citizens of the United States.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BAYNE. The allegation of the gentleman, that the strike at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, now in progress, is the consequence of the protection of American industries, is like many other erroneous conclusions arrived at by the majority of this House. Strikes prevail all over the world. They prevail in England, they prevail in Germany, they prevail in France, and they prevail to the greatest extent where the workingman is the most intelligent and where he is best paid. It requires a man of brains, a man of intellect and of force of character, as well as a man of courage, to assert his rights against capital. When you had slave labor in the South you had no strikes.

You have got, substantially, slave labor there yet, and you have no strikes, because the labor of that section of the country is lacking in that intelligence, that information, and that spirit of courage and of manhood that will make it strike for its rights. One of the best evidences of the prosperity and well-being of the American workingman to-day, to the man who gives attention to these matters, is the fact that he has the ability and the pluck to strike for his rights, and endeavors to maintain them in the face of organized capital.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why, then, do you propose to dominate that class with the police power?

Mr. BAYNE. There is no dominating them by police power. It is simply to keep them from interfering with each other, and prevent the factions into which they are divided from interfering with each other.

Mr. FARQUHAR. To keep the peace.

Mr. BAYNE. And for no other purpose.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER. Does not the law of Pennsylvania clothe the governor with the power, and make it his duty, to appoint a special police force at the instance of these corporations or manufacturing establishments; and are they not required, as the settled system of that State, to wear the badge of the corporation while in its employ? And further may they not be kept there as long as the corporation desires their presence?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know of such a statute.

Mr. WEAVER. There is such a law in force, and the gentleman will find it by reference to Purden's-Brightly's Digest. It is the law of the State, and has been for years.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know that such is the case.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not understand the gentleman to assert that a strike is an evidence of industrial prosperity?

Mr. BAYNE. I certainly do say so; because the gentleman will find all the time that when wages are high and the industries of the country prosperous the laboring men think they ought to be paid better wages, because the manufacturer or employer is making more money. That is the time when strikes are most frequent.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Unless somebody desires to continue the discussion, I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Just one moment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Of course if anybody desires to continue the discussion I shall not insist upon the motion, and withdraw it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, of course I should be derelict in my duty if I allowed the discussion which has been entered into as to this strike in Pennsylvania to go by without a word. I think the conclusions drawn by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] are drawn at a very long distance.

The first quarrel in regard to this Pennsylvania strike—its origin—had reference to a matter of 10 per cent. on the wages of the employés. The papers have fully discussed the subject of the differences between the proprietors of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their employés. The strike itself, as it stands now, is simply a strike between the union and the non-union men. It has nothing to do with the tariff, and nothing to do particularly with the police powers of the State.

I deprecate as much as the gentleman from Kentucky possibly can, or any other man, the presence of Pinkerton's detectives; but I also recognize the fact that gentlemen holding seats here have employed the same agencies in keeping in non-union men and keeping out all union men. I would have liked very much if certain parties were present to-day when the gentleman from Kentucky made the speech he did. I would like to know their concrete reasons.

I want here, Mr. Chairman, as a workingman myself, to say a word on this question. If the impairment of wages, if the slackening of work shall come by the importation of manufactured goods into this country, and the wages shall thereby godown, as they must, and work be scarce, possibly Pinkerton will have to enlarge his force, because I want to say also in connection with that that the men who are outside the gates of Edgar Thomson's works to-day will win if it takes them twelve months, notwithstanding all the Pinkerton men and men who pay scab wages, whatever their politics may be. And my only dread is this, as it was shown to-day in this discussion in the case of our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], that, instead of strikes being an outcome of good times, if we pass this bill, or a free-trade bill, which will only result in making the mechanics of America clothe the farmers for nothing, you will have more strikes on your hands than the Democratic party, or the Republican party either, can take care of in some time to come.

I warn gentlemen on this floor that they are walking on mighty thin ice when they strike one cent out of the American workman's wages or take one hour of the labor that goes to the support of his family, that feeds and clothes his children. For more than twenty years the mechanics of this country have been organizing, and within the last seven years there has risen up a line of organizations that even the oldest organizations stand almost in dread of, because they have the power by an extensive ballot to vindicate their rights, and that power has been felt here on this floor more than once; and when they do they will regulate tariffs for themselves and brothers and not for any class.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Will you tell me why they organize?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Why they organize? Of course, to take care of themselves.

You may talk from now to doomsday for and against the tariff, but I beg to say that the American organizations of skilled labor and the Knights of Labor of America have kept the wages up to what they are to-day; and against any one that tries to beat them down they will hold these wages. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I want, in a word or two, to answer the gentleman from New York. I speak as a laboring man. If the gentleman will lend his aid to remove from the labor of this country the curse of monopoly, and if we succeed in that effort, the mechanics and laboring men of America will more than hold their own with the balance of the world.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so. I know the monopoly he means. It is the monopoly of transportation; the monopoly that would control the shoemaking industries in Massachusetts and shut out the shoemakers of Chicago and Kansas City and St. Louis.

But the light of protection spreads itself a little wider than Massachusetts. I know very well why Massachusetts has slumped toward free trade after having had the benefits of protection. There are others that are going to get the same benefits, North and South.

As regards the monopoly the gentleman from the Milwaukee district speaks of, I know we did try to provide a remedy as far as we could by passing the interstate-commerce bill. And I am willing to go with the gentleman or with any mechanic to amend that act so as to make it a benefit for East and West alike.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Who put these monopolies in the field? [Applause.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. If the gentleman is able to prove it he can go to the States of the West and find where the most of it went. It is there also he has to go for a remedy. Congress has done all it could in the matter of interstate-commerce legislation until the proper workings of the act can be found out and any amendment that is necessary can be made. If the farmers will provide a Western market for the men who make your shoes in Massachusetts and elsewhere they can sell their crops at a better price than at Liverpool. They want a home market for themselves.

The whole transportation problem is contained in the long and short haul clause of that bill. The whole battle we had in these two Congresses was with these transportation companies in the West. I do not make an exception for a single one. They put down the lowest rates for a long haul simply to dump the great East, and they will not make the short haul comport with the long haul when they can sell the product nearer home.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Was it not a Democratic Congress that did away with the difference between the long and the short haul?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I thought it was Senator CULLOM'S bill that did it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Congress corrected that. I think it originated, as some part of this bill did, in the brain of a gentleman from Texas, and Massachusetts agrees with Texas.

Mr. BYNUM. It was the Reagan clause which effected that and which the House insisted should go in.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will not discuss who got it up, because any man in the House or the Senate could have written the bill.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] and myself were members of the Commerce Committee in the Forty-ninth Congress. The long and short haul clause contained in the fourth section of the interstate-commerce bill was intended simply to prevent these corporations, these transportation companies to which reference has been made, from charging my freight for the short haul more than yours for a long haul.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is my proposition.

Mr. TARSNEY. But I supposed they would equalize their rates by decreasing the rate for the short haul and increasing that for the long haul. Instead of that the transportation companies maintained the short-haul rate and increased the long haul. In other words, they made money out of what we intended for the benefit of the entire people.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then, if I took the corollary of the proposition, I would say that the Democrats had made a great mistake in subsidizing the railroads.

Mr. TARSNEY. We made a mistake, if we made a mistake at all, in trusting to the honor of the men engaged in the transportation business in the United States.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is where you rested your faith on a wrong foundation.

Mr. TARSNEY. Very well, sir; press that law until the time comes when the people who are controlling the rates of transportation will come up to the line.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why does not your party press it?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Why do not the majority bring in an amendment to the law?

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. It could not pass.

Mr. TARSNEY. Give the majority of the Commerce Committee the time in this House and you will find that they will do something.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Who controls the time of this House? Do not the majority control it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURROWS moved that the House adjourn, but immediately withdrew the motion.

ANCHORAGE IN THE PORT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. BRYCE, by unanimous consent, called up a bill (S. 2605) relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, empowered, and directed to define and establish an anchorage ground for vessels in the bay and harbor of New York, and in the Hudson and East Rivers, to adopt suitable rules and regulations in relation thereto, and to take all necessary measures for the proper enforcement of such rules and regulations.

SEC. 2. That in the event of the violation of any such rules or regulations by the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, such owner, master, or person in charge of such vessel shall be liable to a penalty of $100, and the said vessel may be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel for the recovery of the same in any United States district court for the district within which such vessel may be, and in the name of the officer designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. BRYCE. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, I will make a very brief statement in regard to this bill.

The object of this bill is, briefly, to bring order out of chaos. The crowded nature of the harbor of New York, becoming continually more crowded every day, renders Federal legislation absolutely imperative. In the interest of navigation it is demanded, in the interest of commerce it is demanded, and also in behalf of the thousands of people who are daily obliged to use the waters of the harbor in going backwards and forwards between their places of business and their homes.

As the matter stands now a vessel can anchor just where she pleases—in the track of summer excursion-boats freighted with the lives of poor people out for a brief holiday, across the path of ferry-boats loaded down to the water's edge with the toiling masses, to the general insecurity of every one, including that of the crews and occupants of these very anchored crafts themselves.

This bill, therefore, is in the interest of the whole floating population of New York, so to speak; and when you consider the value of New York as a port of entry, that three-quarters at least of all the revenues are collected here, it assumes the importance of a great national necessity. Mr. Speaker, I hope the bill will pass. It is unanimously reported by the committee, it asks for no money, and has the warm approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRYCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NANCY G. ALEXANDER.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 6232) for the relief of Nancy G. Alexander.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Nancy G. Alexander, of Cumberland County, Kentucky, the sum of $250, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for coal taken from her by officers of the United States Navy and used by the same on gun-boats on the Cumberland River, during the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS TRAIL CREEK, INDIANA.

Mr. SHIVELY, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 2097) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Trail Creek, in Michigan City, Ind.

The bill was read.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. Speaker, I will not take the time of the House in discussing this bill, but will only say that it has been recommended by the War Department, as is indicated by the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHIVELY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEC. 5. That the county of Latah shall pay to the county of Nez Perces a just proportion of the net indebtedness of said Nez Perces County, the same to be determined as follows, to wit: The county treasurer, recorder, and present county assessor of Nez Perces County are hereby constituted a board of adjusters, who shall proceed to ascertain the net indebtedness of said county of Nez Perces, which shall be done as follows, namely: Ascertain all the county justly owes in warrants, scrip, or other just debts, which amount shall constitute the gross indebtedness of said county, from which deduct the amount of the unpaid portion of the assessment-roll of 1887 and the amount of all the delinquent assessment-rolls which are considered collectible up to that date, and the amount of all moneys and other credits due the county then; and the balance so found shall constitute the net indebtedness of said county of Nez Perces; and the net indebtedness of said county of Nez Perces, ascertained as aforesaid, shall be divided equally between the counties of Nez Perces and Latah in proportion to the taxable property of said counties as it legally appears on the assessment-roll for the year 1887, and the said county of Latah shall cause a warrant or warrants to be drawn upon its treasurer payable to the county of Nez Perces, which said warrant or warrants shall take priority in payment over all other warrants, scrip, or other indebtedness of the said county of Latah.

They may contract with the auditor of Nez Perces County to make the above-named transcripts, the compensation for which shall be in addition to his regular salary. The necessary books for the aforementioned transcripts shall be furnished by Latah County, and the expense of making the said transcripts shall be paid by the counties of Nez Perces and Latah equally. Certificates of the correctness of said records, made as aforesaid, shall have the same legal effect as if made by the auditor of Nez Perces County.

SEC. 7. That the county of Latah is hereby attached to Nez Perces County for judicial purposes until the next meeting of the judges of the supreme court of Idaho Territory, when it shall be the duty of said judges to fix a time for holding court in said county of Latah as provided by the laws of said Territory for the other counties thereof. Thirty days after the time of holding said court is fixed as aforesaid, the said county of Latah shall assume and be vested with all the judicial rights, privileges, and powers of a county under the laws of the said Territory of Idaho.

SEC. 11. That the said board of commissioners are hereby authorized to make sale of said bonds and apply the proceeds thereof to the erection of a court-house and jail, and such other public buildings as may be necessary: Provided, That no bond shall be sold by said commissioners for less than its par value.

SEC. 14. That the commissioners of Nez Perces County be, and they are hereby, authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $30,000, of denominations not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, running for terms of not less than ten nor more than twenty years, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 8 per cent. per annum with interest coupons attached, which bonds shall be signed by the chairman of the said board of commissioners and county auditor, and be authenticated by the seal of said county.

SEC. 15. SEC. 19. That all acts in conflict with any of the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed

SEC. 20. That this act shall be in force from and after its ratification.

Mr. SPRINGER. A bill for this purpose has been reported from the House Committee on Territories exactly in the terms of the Senate bill. It is simply a local measure to provide for the division of a county in Idaho, which the Legislature assumed they could not provide for owing to the United States law against special legislation in the Territories.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS NOXUBEE RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 8343) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot-passenger bridge across the Noxubee River, at or near Gainesville, Ala.

The bill was read.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across a little river in Alabama. The bill contains all the usual provisions. It is recommended by the Secretary of War, and has been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Commerce were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKHEAD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES V. MESLER.

Mr. WEBER, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 2695) for the relief of Charles V. Mesler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in adjusting the accounts of Charles V. Mesler, postmaster at Gosport, in the State of New York, as such postmaster, to allow him a credit of $39.88 for postal-cards, stamps, and envelopes stolen from said Charles V. Mesler, at said post-office, on the night of the 25th or 26th of April, 1880, without any negligence or default on the part of the said postmaster.

The report (by Mr. LAIDLAW) is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred House bill 2695, having considered the same, submit the following report:

A bill for the relief of Charles V. Mesler was before the Forty-ninth Congress. The Committee on Claims of the House submitted the following report:

"The claimant, Charles V. Mesler, in the year 1880, was postmaster at Gosport, N. Y. On the night of April 25, in said year, his post-office was broken into and $39.88 in stamps, cards, and stamped envelopes stolen. The postmaster was guilty of no negligence, and was in no way to blame for said loss.

"In February, 1884, he made application to the Post-Office Department to be allowed a credit for said sum of $39.88. The credit was refused on the ground alone that the claim had not been presented to the Department within six months from the time the act of March 17, 1882 (22 Stat., page 29), went into effect.

"Your committee is clearly of the opinion that the credit should be given, and therefore recommends that the bill do pass."

This committee adopts said report as its report and recommends the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEBER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT HICKMAN, KY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, called up a bill (H. R. 7340) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Hickman, Ky.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think that bill ought to be read.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The bill is in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary of War and of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a very important measure, which I believe has not been before the House until now, and it had better be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. Before the completion of the reading,

Mr. HOLMAN said: Mr. Speaker, I do not insist on the further reading of the bill. I asked to have it read mainly for the purpose of ascertaining the height that was prescribed.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Commerc ewere agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS H. NORTON AND JAMES M'LEAN.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 109) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean, and it be put upon its passage at the present time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $3,200 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay Thomas H. Norton and James McLean, being amount of excess paid by them on coal entry numbered 1 at Del Norte land office, Colorado, July 10, 1882.

Mr. HOLMAN. From what committee did this bill come?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. It was reported by the Committee on Claims. It has passed the Senate. A House bill similar to this has been passed through the Committee on Claims, and this Senate bill also has been reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report, which I expect is short, be read to the House.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I can make a statement in reference to the matter which will be much briefer than the reading of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read, which will take but a moment.

The report (by Mr. MCCULLOGH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 109) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean, having duly considered the same, report as follows:

A similar bill was introduced in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress (H. R. 4760), and was duly considered and reported favorably from the Committee on Claims of that body (House Report No. 2381, Forty-ninth Congress, first session).

The report correctly states the facts, and this committee therefore adopts the same, and recommends the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 2381, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate, and was reported favorably from the Committee on Claims of that body. The report correctly states the facts, and this committee therefore adopts the same, and recommends the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 534, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1256) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean, having duly considered the same make the following report:

The facts are fully stated in the affidavit of T. H. Norton, a letter from Hon. N. C. McFarland, Commissioner of the General Land Office, to the register and receiver of the land office at Del Norte, Colo., dated March 29, 1882, and a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated May 10, 1882, copies of which are made a part of this report.

Claimants recently applied to the Secretary of the Interior for equitable relief. The Acting Secretary, in denying the application, said:

"The subject of said application has been carefully considered, and while the facts stated seem to show a strong calling for relief, it is not in the power of this Department to grant the relief sought, but if it is granted recourse must be had to Congress."

In the opinion of your committee the receipt by the receiver of the local land office of the draft on the First National Bank of Ironton, Ohio, mentioned in the correspondence, for the amount at the time required to pay for the lands sought to be entered, ought to be treated as a payment, and the claimants are equitably entitled to the relief asked.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

AFFIDAVIT OF THOMAS H. NORTON.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, County of Ohio, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a clerk of the county court in and for the county aforesaid, on the ——— day of ———, A. D. 1885, Thomas H. Norton, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

On the 12th day of September, 1881, being then at Villa Grove, Saguache County, Colorado, 75 miles from Del Norte, the nearest United States land office, and being fully aware of the law regulating the sale of United States coal lands, which provides that if a completed railroad approaches to within 15 miles thereof the price to the purchaser shall be $20 per acre, and desiring and intending to avail myself of the law authorizing the sale of such land at $10 per acre, I proceeded on that day by private conveyance to Del Norte expressly and solely to make the legal entry of the south one-half of southwest one-quarter and southwest one-quarter of section 26, and north one-half of northeast one-quarter of section 35, township 46 north, range 8 east, and make payment therefor. I arrived at Del Norte the following day, September 13, 1881, and in company with James McLean, my associate in the entry and purchase of this land, I called at the United States land office at that place, and there found Mr. John Clegborn, the register of said office. Explaining to him the nature of my business, I was permitted at once to make the entry of the land in question.

I paid the requisite fee therefor, and then proposed to pay the sum of $3,200 to complete the entry, having at that time the funds for the purpose on deposit to my individual credit in the Custer County Bank, and fully available to me in currency on that day in Del Norte. To this proposition the register stated that the receiver being absent the payment could be deferred until the end of the month. Subsequent investigation shows that the receiver, Mr. Bristoe, was absent from his office without proper authority, and on that day, September 13, 1881, was in the city of Denver, Colo., over 300 miles from Del Norte. I expressed anxiety to the register about this payment, informing him that the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad was being rapidly constructed to a point within 15 miles of said lands, and would probably reach there before the end of the month, and offered if necessary to leave the funds with the register. In reply that officer explained that the receiver made no report until the end of the month, and that if payment was then made the sale would be duly approved at $10 per acre.

I now distinctly state that had the receiver been at his post of duty on that day the sum of $3,200 would have been paid to him by me in United States currency in payment of the entry of this land; but in the absence of that officer, and upon the assurance of the register that the short delay in payment would not affect the price, the payment was deferred, as stated. Thus the matter rested until September 30. Being on that day at Buena Vista, Colo., 150 miles distant from Del Norte, I telegraphed the register, asking if he would grant an extension of thirty days in which to make the payment, and receiving a negative reply, I immediately mailed to him a sight draft for $3,200 on the First National Bank of Ironton, Ohio, which draft was duly received by the receiver, forwarded for collection, and the proceeds duly paid over to the United States.

I received no notice or intimation of any kind, by telegraph, mail, or otherwise, from said receiver that he could not or would not receive said draft in payment for said lands; therefore I supposed the transaction was closed and the entry complete, and received no information to the contrary until long after October 15, 1881, when I was informed that the Commissioner of the General Land Office had decided otherwise, and directed the local land officers to require Mr. McLean and myself to pay an additional sum of $10 per acre before said entries would be recognized by him as complete. I further state that had the receiver of said land office, on the receipt of said draft by him, notified me that he could not accept the same payment for said land, I could and would have paid to him in lawful money of the United States therefor before the 15th day of October following the date said railroad was completed to within 15 miles of said lands.

I further state that by reason of the neglect of said receiver to inform me as soon as he received said draft that he could not or would not accept the same in payment for said lands, and by the order of said Commissioner aforesaid, a consequence resulting from said neglect, in improvements made upon said lands before and after applying to enter the same as aforesaid, we were compelled to pay the sum of $10 per acre for said lands in addition to a like sum previously paid by us therefor, as aforesaid, amounting to the sum of $3,200, which we would not have been compelled to pay had the said receiver been at his post of duty when we first applied to enter said lands, or had he returned said draft to me on his receipt thereof and informed me that he could receive nothing but lawful money of the United States in payment for said lands, as (it is the belief of affiant) was his duty to do.

T. H. NORTON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 23d of November, 1885.

GEORGE HOOK,
Clerk of the County Court of Ohio County, State of West Virginia.

Ex parte Thomas H. Norton and James McLean to have refunded $3,200, wrongfully exacted from them on coal-land entry No. 1, Del Norte, Colo.

MARCH 20.

GENTLEMEN: The evidence submitted in the matter of coal entry No. 1 in the series of your office made November 11, 1881, for the claim of James McLean and Thomas H. Norton, embracing 320 acres of land described as the south one-half of southwest one-quarter and southeast one-quarter of section 26, and the north one-half of the northeast one-quarter of section 35, in township 46 north, of range 8 east, N. M. M., has been carefully considered.

The entry was allowed upon the payment of $10 per acre, notwithstanding the fact that at the date thereof the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad had been completed to a point within 15 miles of the land embraced therein, thus raising the question whether the entry allowed upon payment at the rate of $10 per acre should be approved or whether the claimant should be required to make an additional payment of $10 per acre, which would aggregate $3,200. Section 2347, U. S. Revised Statutes, provides:

"That any person above the age of twenty-one years, who is a citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, or any association of persons severally qualified as above, shall, upon application to the register of the proper land office, have the right to enter by legal subdivisions any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States not otherwise appropriated or reserved by competent authority, not exceeding 160 acres to such individual person, or 320 acres to such association, upon payment to the receiver of not less than $10 per acre for such lands where the same shall be situated more than 15 miles from any completed railroad, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such road."

The price of the land is determined by the law and the facts as they exist at the date when the money is paid and the entry made.

In this case the money was paid as per the record on the 11th of November, 1881, and not on the 4th of October, 1881, the date when the draft on the First National Bank of Ironton, Ohio, was received by the receiver.

In view of the foregoing, the claimants will be required to make an additional payment of $10 per acre, which would aggregate $3,200.

You will notify the claimants of this decision, and allow them sixty days for appeal, and after the expiration of the time allowed for appeal you will report any action taken to this office.

Very respectfully,

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

REGISTER and RECEIVER,
Del Norte, Colo.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, May 10, 1882.

SIR: I have considered the appeal of James McLean and Thomas H. Norton, from your decision of March 29 last, requiring an additional payment of $10 per acre on their purchase of the south half of southwest quarter and southeast quarter of section 26, and the north half of northeast quarter of section 35, in township 46 north, range southeast, Del Norte, Colo.

The tracts are coal lands, and the only question is whether their price should be $10 or $20 per acre; and this depends, under section 2347 of the Revised Statutes, upon their proximity to a completed railroad. If at the date of proof and payment, which constitutes the entry, the land is more than 15 miles from such road, the price is not less than $10 per acre; if within 15 miles, it is not less than $20 per acre (see my predecessor's decisions of October 17, 1881, Copp, November, 1881, in which I concur). The price of coal lands varies, therefore, according to its relations to a completed railroad, and each case depends upon the facts peculiar to itself.

The present case shows that on September 13, 1881, the appellants filed a declaratory statement for the land in question and paid the official fees, and soon thereafter mailed to the local officers the personal draft of one of them for $3,200, the price of 320 acres, at $10 per acre, upon a bank in Ohio. This draft was received at the local office between October 1 and 3, and was sent to another bank for collection on October 4, the receiver declining to accept it as payment for the land until it was honored. It was not paid until November 11, when the entry was allowed at $10 per acre. On September 13 no railroad was completed to within 15 miles of the land, but the Denver and Rio Grande had progressed and was completed to within that distance on or about October 15.

If, instead of a draft, the appellants had paid $3,200 in money on September 13, or had the avails of the draft been received at the local office before October 15, they would have been entitled to the land at $10 per acre; but as money only can be received in payment of Government land, and this payment was not made until November 11, the price of the land, by reason of the progress of the road to within 15 miles of the land, was enhanced to $20 per acre.

The appellants appear to have acted in entire good faith, but under the mistaken supposition that their draft was a payment for the lands and sufficient to cause an entry thereof.

I can not, however, regard the equities in their favor as against a strict requirement of the law, and affirm your decision.

The papers transmitted with your letter of April 22, 1882, are herewith returned

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. HOLMAN. There seems to be an equity in this case which will justify the refunding of this money; but I suggest that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until some day in the future when private business is under consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Say next Friday.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; next Friday, perhaps, will be taken up by the debate on the tariff bill.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Then fix some other day—say when the Private Calendar is next under consideration.

Mr. BYNUM. In justice to claims which I have on the Private Calendar I must object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my colleague will not object to the proposition which I have suggested.

Mr. BYNUM. I object to it simply because I have bills on the Private Calendar which have been there for three Congresses, and I do not believe it would be fair to them or other like business on the Private Calendar to take a case out of its order and give it precedence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object to this bill, because there seems to be an equity in it. The fact is, when the final entry was made there was a railroad within 15 miles of the land, which would make the price $20 instead of $10.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Let me make a statement. When the entry was made there was no railroad within 15 miles of the land. The office fees were offered and the entry was made, but the land officer was absent and the clerk refused to receive the money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the session closes at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes, p. m.; and that hour having arrived, in the opinion of the Chair it is incompetent for the House to do any further business. Therefore the Chair now declares the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 30, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Having had occasion to be out of the Senate on the last day of the session for a few minutes, I asked my colleague [Mr. BERRY] to hand in a report for me from the Committee on Indian Affairs on the bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, to or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas, and authorizing said company to build a bridge across the Arkansas River, at or near the city of Fort Smith, Ark. I omitted to amend the title of the bill, striking out the feature for the building of a bridge across the Arkansas River, and as read just now in the Journal I find it was reported as containing that feature. In point of fact all the sections of the bill providing for the building of the railroad bridge were stricken out, so that the title of the bill should have stopped at the word "Kansas," and that part of the title "authorizing said company to build a bridge across the Arkansas River, at or near the city of Fort Smith, Ark.," should have been stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment of the title can be made when the bill is passed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. But I thought, perhaps, it was best to give notice to the Senate of the change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal shows the report as made, and is correct.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I suppose that is true.

The Journal was approved.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of April 24, 1888, a list of Presidential post-offices in the United States and in the Territories whose annual receipts for the three last preceding years have exceeded $3,000; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

They also pray for the repeal of the tax on alcohol used in the arts and for medicinal purposes. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition of certain citizens of Salina, Saline County, Kansas, praying that provision be made at this session of Congress for the payment of Indian depredation claims, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I wish to state in connection with this petition that three or four years ago the matter was brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations in a way which led them to insert a provision in an appropriation bill whereby the Interior Department was authorized and provided with funds to enable it to thoroughly investigate all pending Indian depredation claims, and required to report the result of the finding made to Congress.

That investigation is going on, and I think we shall be able to learn before the final adjournment, and perhaps very soon, the result of the investigation. I am satisfied, without knowing anything about the plan of the investigation or especially about its results, that we shall be able to get a great deal of very valuable information upon which to predicate legislation.

I have no doubt that a large majority of these claims ought to be paid; that the Government is in equity, if not otherwise, bound to pay them; and I am in hopes that many of the difficulties which have heretofore surrounded this class of claims on account of imperfect proof, lack of knowledge, and misunderstanding in regard to the relations of the Government to them and of the Indians to them, will be removed by this investigation.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to say a word in reply to the Senator from Kansas.

I think we already know the result of the investigations which have been made. As stated by the Senator from Kansas, $50,000 have been appropriated in the last three years; first, $20,000, I believe; then $10,000, and then $20,000; at any rate $50,000 or $60,000 have been appropriated for that purpose. Under that authority the Department have been going ahead and investigating these claims and reporting to Congress each year the result of their investigations. They have passed on a great number of claims, and they are now standing here upon our record.

Various bills have been introduced, bills of a general nature and bills of a special nature, some of which have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, some to the Committee on Claims, and others to the Committee on Military Affairs. There is a divided jurisdiction on the subject, and the result is that no action whatever has been taken or is proposed to be taken, so far as I know, by any committee of this body.

In view of these facts and in view of the further fact that upon the suggestion made by the Chief Executive of the nation, a special committee has been raised in the House of Representatives for the purpose of considering this very subject, I have thought, after full consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Claims, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and sundry other members of the Senate, that the proper thing to do would be to raise a special committee, who would not be burdened with any other business, and who could take up this subject and consider what policy Congress ought to adopt in reference to the whole matter. Such a committee should be raised, not for the purpose of taking up simply individual claims and passing upon them—because I do not think that is the proper thing to do—but to adopt some general policy by which parties could say to the various claimants, those whose claims have been passed upon, as well as those whose claims have not been passed upon, whether Congress intends to pay them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, if the Senator from Kansas will give way for a minute more, I wish to pass a public-building bill for Lancaster, Pa. It is House bill 1788, Order of Business 1040.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1788) for the erection of a public building in Lancaster, Pa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I now ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order will be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. DOLPH to the amendment of Mr. HOAR.

Mr. PLUMB. I am authorized by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to withdraw the amendment which he offered to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in order that there may be a direct vote on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I shall move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table in order that a vote may be had at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment now is that of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

That in all cases where any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act have heretofore been sold by the proper officers of the United States for cash, or with the allowance and approval of the proper officers of the United States entered in good faith under the homestead or pre-emption laws, or have been selected by any State and certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and approved by the Secretary of the Interior in satisfaction or as part of any grant to such State in aid of any public work or improvement which has been fully completed, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming any such lands under such sales, entries, or selections, and certificates shall be, and are hereby, confirmed, where, at the date of the passage of this act, there are no adverse claims to the same on file or of record arising under the general land laws of the United States; and any controversies or conflicting claims between adverse claimants, or between such adverse claimants and those whose title would otherwise be confirmed by the provisions of this act, shall be determined according to the priority of entry, certification, or application, and the provisions of existing laws, and in the same manner in all respects as though the said grants herein forfeited had never been made by the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. The Senator from Kansas moves that the amendment lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator did not make that motion, but merely gave notice of it.

Mr. PLUMB. I made the motion, but withdraw it for the purpose of hearing the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Kansas to submit the motion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, last week there was some evidence read to the Senate which affected somewhat a firm of attorneys in this city, the evidence tending to show that there had been certain fraudulent contracts made in violation of the law, and certain letters were read indicating a knowledge of the fraud and a desire to have a hold on the settlers who had testified falsely that those contracts did not exist. One of the persons implicated addressed a communication to the Senate, which was read by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], saying that he was satisfied those letters were written, but they were written by his partner, and the contracts were not written. The partner has now addressed to me a brief letter which he desires to have submitted to the Senate. It will take but a minute to read it. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 28, 1888.

SIR: In the matter of controversy as to the Iron River lands in Michigan, I wish to say, through your courtesy, that I received a number of contracts made by settlers to convey interests to me from Mr. Weimer and local attorneys at Marquette, as did Redington and Hill afterwards; and they were accepted, because I was sure that was the only way I could be certain to be paid for what promised to be to me, and proved to be, a very expensive lot of cases, none of the settlers having any money to pay for printing, clerical labor, etc.

No settlers were hired to go on the land by me, and no organization for that purpose was necessary. It would have required an army to keep them off, Secretary Teller having decided in a case in which I was attorney for a settler that the cash entries of these lands was void because the land was unoffered.

I abandoned the matter, not because of the purchase and publication of my letters to one of the local attorneys, as the submission of his letters to me would have put a different light on that matter, but because it was deemed necessary by Messrs. Redington and Weimer to destroy the contracts and join them in an affidavit that they never existed, which I would not do.

Very respectfully,

W. C. HILL.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
United States Senate.

Mr. BECK. Before the vote is taken I desire to inquire if there is anything in the bill—I am not able to discover it if there is—that deprives any one of any existing rights in this controversy now going on.

Mr. PLUMB. I think not. I think it leaves everything of that kind standing exactly where it would be if the bill were not passed.

Mr. BECK. My desire, as far as I am concerned, is to vote for any affirmative proposition in the bill which shall declare that nothing in the act shall deprive any person of any right he has in any controversy growing out of any rights which now exist and leave them the same as if the bill had not passed. Further than that I will not say that I am prepared to go in any affirmative action settling any dispute. Would the affirmation be any stronger if such a clause were put in the bill to guard existing rights?

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to accepting, as far as I may, an amendment of that character.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to call attention to the force of the first section of this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I now renew the motion I made to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me a moment. The Senator from Kansas is of opinion that if this bill passes without such an amendment it will leave everybody's rights touching this land just as they would be if the bill did not pass. I can not see it in that light.

and I want the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the operation of the first section of the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and coterminous with the portion of any such railroad not now completed and in operation, for the construction or benefit of which lands have heretofore been granted; and all such lands are declared to be a part of the public domain.

That is of to-day. The claim of the canal company is that the State of Michigan granted these lands to that canal company, or its representatives, when the State had not the right to do it, because they were lands theretofore granted to a railroad which is uncompleted. Therefore this bill would forfeit as of to-day those lands opposite the uncompleted portions of the road; then the lands belong to the United States as of to-day.

All the claim which these parties can set up to it being through the State of Michigan by a title which the State of Michigan had no right to grant because the Supreme Court have decided that the title was in the railroad company until the United States forfeited it, it being forfeited as of to-day, what becomes of them?

Mr. BECK. What I desire is not to have any affirmative action affirming anything as to parties having rights there, they having controversies between each other, but to have it affirmatively expressed on the face of the bill that nothing in this bill contained shall operate to divest any persons of any rights they may have had heretofore in any of the lands otherwise affected by it, so that they can settle their respective claims before the courts of the country as though this bill had not passed.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me that to carry out the Senator's idea there must be a saving clause from this forfeiture as of to-day of lands the title to which technically is in the railroad company, although the State of Michigan and the United States before the decision supposed that the lands were not the railroad's until the railroad was finished. The decision is that it was a grant in præsenti, and it is still standing on the record as a grant to that railroad company, and the canal's grant is a part of lands opposite unfinished portions of the railroad.

Mr. BECK. Because the Senator from Kansas in charge of the bill and other Senators with whom I have conversed have said that that is the purpose of the bill, I desire to have it in such shape that there shall be no misunderstanding about it. That being done I am prepared to vote against all affirmative amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] asks me whereabouts in the bill is what I have stated. It is in it, because it does not refer to the rights of any person under the peculiar conditions of things existing within the limits of this land grant in Michigan. Now, the Senator from Massachusetts, for the purpose of his argument, assumes that the change of the title from the railroad company under the original granting act to the United States Government will in some way deprive somebody of a right. It seems to me that it is only necessary to state that to show that it has no existence. If the railroad company had the title somebody else can not have it—the canal company, private entryman, homesteader, pre-emptor, or anybody else; and the only thing that this bill does would be to transfer, according to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the title which is now vested in the railroad company to the United States. Nobody could have had any right there which would be in anywise interfered with by such a change of proprietorship. But for the purpose of settling the point specially I have no objection to anything which is merely negative in its character and does not confer any rights, but which simply preserves the statu quo going into the bill, speaking for myself as an individual member of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, this discussion is entirely apart from the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and I renew the motion I made to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The Senator from Kansas moves to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] specially desires to offer a modification of that amendment, which I suppose is unobjectionable, and I should like to have the modification offered before the vote.

Mr. PLUMB. If that will be offered at once I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir, I withdraw the motion for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Wisconsin to offer the modification.

Mr. SPOONER. I will offer my amendment after this is disposed of.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I renew my motion.

Mr. PALMER. Will not the Senator allow me to say a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PALMER. I merely desire to have this bill divested of all collateral questions. This is a collateral question, and has nothing to do with the bill, and has no business in it.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well; so I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the amendment lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, section 3, line 24, after the word "quantity" it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the rights of way and riparian rights heretofore conveyed to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company of New York, by deed of conveyance dated August 8, 1886, and which are described as follows: A strip of land 50 feet in width, being 25 feet on each side of the center line of a water-pipe line, as the same is staked out and located, or as it shall be hereafter finally located according to the provisions of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon approved November 25, 1885, providing for the means to supply the city of Portland with an abundance of good, pure, and wholesome water over and across the following-described tracts of land: Sections 19 and 31, in township 1 south, of range 6 east; sections 25, 31, 33, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 5 east; sections 3 and 5, in township 2 south, of range 5 east; section 1, in township 2 south, of range 4 east; sections 23, 25, and 35, in township 1 south, of range 4 east, of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, are hereby granted and confirmed unto the said city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, its successors and assigns forever, with the right to enter on the hereinbefore-described strip of land, over and across the above-described sections for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and repairing a water-pipe line as aforesaid. And there is also hereby granted to the said city of Portland, its successors and assigns forever, all riparian rights whatever which rightfully and properly attach to such of the above-described lands as lie contiguous and adjacent to the stream in the above-named sections known as Bull Run.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will make a word of explanation to the Senate, when I think there will be, perhaps, no objection to the amendment. This relates to lands adjacent to uncompleted road of the Northern Pacific Company. They have built no road between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oregon, 114 miles. Some time ago the Legislature of the State of Oregon authorized the city of Portland to provide for bringing good, wholesome, fresh water into that city to supply the city, and it became necessary to get that water some 15 or 20 miles from the city. They succeeded in obtaining a contract from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company of New York, with whom the Northern Pacific was dealing in regard to bonds, for the right of way over the odd sections from Bull Run to the city of Portland. The object of this amendment is simply to protect the city in that right of way. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. PLUMB. This matter was not brought to the attention of the committee prior to the reporting of the bill, and I never knew anything of it myself personally until this amendment was proposed. According to its terms it seems to convey a strip of land 50 feet wide across certain odd-numbered sections for the distance stated by the Senator from Oregon, about 15 miles, for the purpose of enabling the city of Portland to construct water-works. I do not know that I see in that anything which is objectionable, and it may be very important to the city to have this right; but I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to this point: If he anticipates that this right is valuable to the city of Portland, he must remember that after having this title confirmed the city will be obliged to resort to individual entrymen to get the right of way on the even sections. The entrymen on the even-numbered sections occupy the same space, and therefore the city would be in as much trouble practically with the amendment as without it.

Mr. MITCHELL. We are advised that the city of Portland has already obtained the right of way through all the lands on the even-numbered sections.

Mr. PLUMB. It must, then, be land which has been entered and of which the title has passed through the Government to entrymen.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; and this is the only thing in the way of having the right to go on with this work. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands will not make any objection to the amendment. It is important to the city of Portland.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask one other question. The last sentence of the amendment says:

And there is also hereby granted to the said city of Portland, its successors and assigns forever, all riparian rights whatever which rightfully and properly attach to such of the above-described lands as lie contiguous and adjacent to the stream in the above-named sections known as Bull Run.

Does the Senator understand that that is simply a riparian right on this right of way, or is there a large surface on this stream upon public lands?

Mr. MITCHELL. I can not state just how this right of way runs. I am not fully advised as to that. I do know, however, that the stream runs from north to south and it is tapped by this right of way which runs over the other sections. The object is simply to protect the city in what it would have obtained under these deeds of the Northern Pacific Company and the Trust Company had they the title to the lands.

Mr. PLUMB. What will be the riparian rights?

Mr. MITCHELL. The right to take the water from the stream and convey it over the right of way of 50 feet. That would be all.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that that be amended in such a way as to apply merely to the right of way.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not see any particular objection to such a restriction.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon whether the phraseology of the first part of the amendment will not be held as a recognition by Congress of the right of the railroad company to make title to that portion of its grant embraced within the terms of his amendment, and whether it would not be better to provide for the conveyance of that interest by the United States rather than to give recognition to the conveyance made by the railroad company?

Mr. PLUMB. In line 22 of the amendment it is provided that the sections described "are hereby granted and confirmed unto the said city of Portland." That might be held to refer to the grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, but those words being stricken out it would be a grant from the United States, and the reference to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company would only be effective as descriptive of the transaction.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I fear that the language used might be held to mean more than a mere part of the description of the tract.

Mr. MITCHELL. What change would the Senator suggest?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely call attention to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The second section of the bill, as reported by the committee, undertakes to protect those who have contracts from the State or the railroad company who are occupying odd sections. This simply provides that the right of way which the city of Portland has obtained from this company shall be protected.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have not a copy of the amendment before me; but it occurred to my mind as I heard it read that the first part of the amendment was susceptible of the construction I have suggested, that it is a recognition by Congress of the right of the Northern Pacific Company to make conveyance of a part of the land which it had not yet covered by constructed line.

Mr. MITCHELL. In order to meet that objection I will suggest this amendment: Insert, after the word "heretofore," in line 2, the words "attempted to be."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that would be an improvement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon modifies his amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, after the word "heretofore," insert the words "attempted to be;" so as to read:

Provided, That the rights of way and riparian rights heretofore attempted to be conveyed to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Trust Company of New York, etc.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, in order to meet the objection suggested by the chairman of the committee, I move to strike out all after the word "aforesaid" in line 27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 27 of the amendment, after the word "aforesaid," it is proposed to strike out:

And there is also hereby granted to the said city of Portland, its successors and assigns forever, all riparian rights whatever which rightfully and properly attach to such of the above-described lands as lie contiguous and adjacent to the stream in the above-named sections known as Bull Run.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I so modify it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also modify the amendment at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], by inserting after the word "Oregon," in line 22, the words "forfeited by this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed modification will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Oregon," in line 22 of the amendment, insert "forfeited by this act;" so as to read:

In the State of Oregon, forfeited by this act, are hereby granted and confirmed unto the said city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. By direction of the Committee on Public Lands I propose the following amendment as an additional section to the bill, section 8.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that he add that as a second proviso to section 1.

Mr. PADDOCK. That will be agreeable to me. I had thought of doing that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional proviso to section 1:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as limiting the rights granted to purchasers or settlers by "An act to provide for the adjustments of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, or as repealing, altering, or amending said act, nor as in any manner affecting any cause of action existing in favor of any purchaser against his grantor for breach of any covenant of title.

Mr. CALL. That amendment of the Senator from Nebraska seems to be a very wide and sweeping amendment, and seems to give title to anybody who wants it to any of these lands. I do not think such an amendment as that ought to be adopted hastily.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. CALL. I say the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska seems to confirm any claim that anybody chooses to make to this land. The adjustment act passed at the last session has been construed by the Secretary of the Interior to cover almost any possible claim, whether there was a particle of authority in any act granted by Congress or not. If there has been a claim made by a railroad company under any grant to a piece of land it is held under the wide terms of that act to embrace it, and that decision is on file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. So, practically, that adjustment act is made a confirmatory act of every false and fraudulent claim that any railroad company may seek to make to any portion of the public domain within the limits or the assumed limits of the grant. This amendment seems to give color to that construction of that act, and it is very difficult to understand what it does mean or to what it will apply.

Mr. PADDOCK. The object of the amendment is simply to affirm the doctrine of the act of 1887 in respect of the saving clauses to innocent purchasers and settlers upon these lands which shall be forfeited. A prosecution has been instituted, or ordered to be instituted, in the case of certain lands taken by the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska under its grant, to recover those lands. A large proportion, perhaps all of them, or nearly all, have been disposed of to settlers, to innocent purchasers, and are now occupied as farms under settlement; and the aim of this amendment is simply to protect that class of people, that class of claims.

Mr. CALL. I submit to the Senate that it is very dangerous legislation. This term "innocent purchaser" may comprehend every one who without authority of law and in violation of the express terms of the granting act has made purchase from a railroad company. I think it would be entirely right in the spirit of the homestead law to confirm the title of every man in actual possession, and there might be a color of equity in the fact that he had been led to make a bona fide purchase of a limited quantity of a supposed grant; but this idea of an innocent purchaser is absurd when there was notice in the law that the grantor had no title whatever, which covers the whole domain of the land grants made by the Interior Department, or these adjustments made by the Interior Department of land which is covered by no grant whatever and the title to which originates in the claim that an innocent purchaser has bought the public domain from some person whom Congress never authorized to have any interest in it. All that class of legislation is simply a confirmation of all these fraudulent acts, and vests the title, unless strictly guarded, in speculators and purchasers of large areas of the public domain.

These amendments, unless clearly so expressed and provided for in an act specifically directed to the protection of the actual settlers, are in the interest of large purchasers and speculators in the public domain; and in the State of Florida a very large proportion of the public lands, under the language of this amendment, if it is made applicable generally, would be covered and the title pass out of the persons in actual possession and rightfully entitled under the law and into the hands of those who have had notice time and again, by the terms of the granting act and by an exposition of the concurrent facts attending the case, that there was no title in the party from whom they bought. The language of this amendment may give some color of sanction, unless explained and qualified by an amendment, to the unauthorized action of a judge of the United States court, which is now or soon will be the subject of an investigation by Congress.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if these are cases of forfeiture now?

Mr. CALL. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. PADDOCK. Are these cases in Florida to which the Senator refers cases of actual forfeiture?

Mr. CALL. No, they are not.

Mr. PADDOCK. Then this bill does not apply to them at all. This simply confirms the doctrine set forth in the act of 1887, and I do not see in what interest particularly the Senator interposes. If on behalf of the Government, the answer is that the Government is protected, the railroad company has to account by cash payment to the Government for these lands, if they have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers and settlers. If they are lands held by private settlers, the title is to be preserved to them, and the companies are to account to the Government for them. So I can not see in what interest the Senator can properly interpose objection. The rights of the Government and the equities of the settlers are alike protected. The amendments provide for no enlargement of the equities to innocent purchasers provided in the act of 1887; they simply provide against any limitations thereof through the passage of this bill.

Mr. CALL. I have not read the Senator's amendment, but I understand it to be this: That under the terms of this act these lands are forfeited, and his amendment provides a confirmation or a vesting of the title in innocent purchasers, as I understand.

Mr. PADDOCK. Simply that nothing shall be construed under this proposed act to operate as a virtual repeal in respect to those rights which are provided for by the act of 1887.

Mr. PLUMB. This amendment of the Senator from Nebraska only says in substance that this shall not be construed as qualifying, amending, or repealing the act of March 3, 1887.

It is not necessary for the purpose of what I shall have to say or for the purpose of the amendment to defend the act of 1887. I will say that the construction of it has been different from what I expected it would be. It has been given a wider scope than I anticipated. The question as to what amendment, if any, should be made to the act is now under consideration in the Public Lands Committee in connection with the Land Department; and the only purpose of this amendment is that we may not do indirectly or unadvisedly what if we are to do we ought to do directly. We simply say that this shall not refer to that act at all. That is all of it. It does not put any construction on that act; it does not enlarge it; it does not extend it. It simply says this bill shall not in any way affect that act. That is all.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is no enlargement whatever.

Mr. PLUMB. Of course the question as to what classes of persons ought to be confirmed is a very important question. It is designed to settle a certain class of cases by that act. Subsequently, after its passage—I do not say not in accordance with its terms, but certainly not according to the understanding of those who prepared it—the Attorney-General made a decision giving it a wider scope than I thought it would properly bear. I say that with all due respect to him and to his superior legal knowledge; but he went further than I think he should have gone. This, however, does not enlarge that act, does not subtract from it, does not affect it in any way. It simply says that this bill shall not interfere with that act. An amendment of that act, if it is to be amended, should be disposed of by itself, and not in an indirect way.

Mr. CALL. I was very much in hopes that this act, providing for a manifestly just and proper object of public policy, the forfeiture of the grants beyond the point of completion at least, should be a fixed fact, as to which I presume there is a universal acquiescence on the part of everybody, both in and out of Congress; but if the affirmation of that principle is right, it would repeal to that extent the act which has had official construction and is having official execution to-day in the issuing of patents, and that construction being, in my opinion (if the act warrants it), a most monstrous wrong to the people of this country and an evil precedent to be established in our legislation; that all that has to be done in order to make a good title to the people's land is to have a false claim made and a deed made by a corporation to any part of the public domain, dispossessing the settler, depriving the man who wishes to go on the land for cultivation of his right and opportunity to do so, and affirming in naked and bald terms, according to the construction of the Department, that a false claim, however originated, whether in perjury or in fraud, shall be sufficient to constitute a valid title, that claim being effectuated by a conveyance of any kind from a corporation. I say, Mr. President, that in my judgment that is a monstrous provision of law, and I agree with the Senator from Kansas that it was not so understood by those who passed the bill of last session, and this construction is, in my judgment, unwarranted, but still it is having execution. To-day decisions are being made under this construction of the law which can never be undone except by some suit instituted by the authority of Government. I am therefore myself very much opposed to any action which will limit the effect of the affirmation of the just principle of this bill; that beyond the point of completion at least, without affecting our right to do more hereafter, it shall be declared that these lands are absolutely forfeited and open to the honest labor and occupation of the people of this country. I am opposed to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK].

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], but I understand that the pair is transferred, and I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I inquire whether the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has voted.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that this is the amendment of my colleague [Mr. MANDERSON], with whom the Senator is paired. The Senator from Nebraska, my colleague, is absent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I will withhold my vote.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN] on all questions.

Mr. CULLOM. I announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the negative). I ask leave to withdraw my vote. I announce my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. I do not know how he would vote, if present.

Mr. BECK (after having voted in the negative). I voted, but I find that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is necessarily absent, and I am paired with him on all questions. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNA. I am assured by the colleague of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], with whom I am paired, that he would vote "yea" on this amendment if present, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the negative). I believe I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he is advised of that pair.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. Then, as I do not know how the Senator from Connecticut would vote on this amendment if he were present, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 7; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I have an amendment in the hands of the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Florida will be reported. The Secretary desires to be informed which amendment it is of those proposed by the Senator that he now offers.

Mr. CALL. To add as a new section, section 8.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 8. That all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants, who made actual settlement on any of said lands, or who made application for homestead or pre-emption under the authority of the Legislature of the State for the same after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of the said road, or who made actual settlement before the location of any line of railroad after the expiration of the time of completion, shall have their title confirmed and a patent shall be issued to them on compliance with the homestead or pre-emption law; all lands affected by any grant where the granting act required a disposal by the Legislature of the State, and there has been no disposal by the State Legislature in the time required by the granting act, are hereby declared subject to homestead entry and settlement; and in all cases persons in possession of lots in town sites and of tracts of land shall have the preferred right of entering the same to the extent of 360 acres.

Mr. PLUMB. That has been considerably amended since it was printed. I should like to have the Senator explain where it differs from the amendment offered by him on the 17th instant and printed.

Mr. CALL. I have transposed some words and put in a provision for confirming town lots to persons in possession.

Mr. PLUMB. But it speaks of 360 acres.

Mr. CALL. That was intended to refer to sections of land outside. In all cases persons in possession of lots in town sites and of tracts of land shall have the preferred right of entering the same to the extent of 320 acres. It should be 320 instead of 360.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me suggest to the Senator that he strike out, in lines 3 and 4, the words "or who made application for the same."

Mr. CALL. I hope we shall have better order. I can not hear a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will suspend until there is order in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest to the Senator, in order to make his amendment accomplish what I think he designs, to strike out the words "or who made application for the same." If he authorizes persons to go upon land for which they made application, he will see that he will take in persons probably who have made other entries on the public land. What he wants, as I take it, is to preserve as far as he can the rights of persons who made actual settlement. In that I agree with him.

Mr. CALL. I accept that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Then modify it by striking out the words I have suggested.

Mr. CALL. I will modify the amendment by striking out the words "or who made application for the same."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the amendment of the Senator from Florida has been changed since it has been printed, and therefore it will be necessary for the Senator to send the amendment to the desk before the Secretary can note the modification. The modification proposed by the Senator from Florida will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 of the amendment, after the word "lands," it is proposed to strike out "or who made application for the same;" so as to read:

That all actual settlers on any public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grant, who made actual settlement of any of said lands after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of said road, etc.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing. All that follows that down to the word "State," in line 8, is mere repetition, because of course the roads could not have been constructed before they were located. There is, therefore, but one class of persons who settled on the land before the road was constructed. The Senator will find that he is simply repeating what is before said in effect. All after the word "road," down to the word "State," in line 8, should be stricken out.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that this amendment relates entirely to the state of things in Florida. We have a line of road known as the Pensacola and Georgia road in one State and in the other as the road from Tampa. It has various names. The Pensacola and Georgia road was not located by the authority of the State in any legal or proper sense of the word, but the sections under the granting act of 1856 were reserved along the proposed line of location.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator one question there. Was the road completed within the time named in the granting act?

Mr. CALL. No; it never has been completed down to to-day.

Mr. PLUMB. Then the Senator will readily see that the language of the amendment down to the word "road," in line 5, covers all that class of claims. I simply do not want in the amendment this large number of words, which I think are without meaning. The purport of this is embraced in what precedes it in the amendment. The first part of the Senator's amendment provides for the right of persons to settle within the lines of a railroad grant after the time named in the granting act for the completion of the road. That is more comprehensive than the language which follows, and governs the same class of cases.

Mr. CALL. Perhaps the Senator is correct, and I will accept his modification.

Mr. PLUMB. That leaves out all of the amendment after the word "road," in line 5, down to the word "State," in line 8.

Mr. CALL. I think on reflection the Senator is right, and I will modify the amendment in that manner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated. Will the Senator from Kansas restate the proposed modification?

Mr. PLUMB. In line 5 of the printed amendment, after the word "road," strike all thence on down, including the word "State," in line 8.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, after the word "road," it is proposed to strike out—

Or who made actual settlement before the location of any line of railroad after the expiration of the time of completion, with the authority of the Legislature of the State.

So as to read:

That all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants hereinbefore referred to, who made actual settlement on any of said lands, after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of the said road, shall have their title confirmed, and a patent shall be issued to them on compliance with the homestead or pre-emption law, etc.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, let me make another suggestion. In line 8, after the word "have," strike out what follows and insert "shall have the right to perfect their entries respectively under the homestead or pre-emption law."

Mr. CALL. I accept that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. And then provide for the continuance of their settlement to the ripening of the right when they will get patents under existing law.

Mr. CALL. I will modify the amendment in that way.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to modify the amendment so as to read:

That all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants, who made actual settlement on any of said lands after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of said road, shall have the right to perfect their entries respectively under the homestead or pre-emption laws; all lands affected by any grant where the granting act required a disposal by the Legislature of the State and there has been no legislative disposal by the State Legislature in the time required by the granting act are hereby declared subject to homestead entry and settlement; and in all cases persons in possession of lots in town-sites and of tracts of land shall have the preferred right of entering the same to the extent of 360 acres.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that apply to Florida alone?

Mr. CALL. It only applies to Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] as modified.

Mr. PLUMB. I think there ought to be some further modifications or some further explanation of the last part of the amendment before it is finally adopted.

Mr. HOAR. As it is now within two minutes of 2 o'clock, I hope that the amendment will be printed and go over. It affects important interests and it ought to be carefully considered and understood. I hope that the vote will not be taken within these two minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Florida will suspend, the Chair will lay before the Senate some House bills and resolutions for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

The joint resolution (H. Res. 148) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Seth C. Moffatt, late a Representative in Congress, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

FISH AND FISHERIES REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 27, 1888.

Whereas it appears by the report made to the House of Representatives from the Committee on Printing, February 16, 1888, that there are in the hands of the Public Printer 507 sets of the document known as Fish and Fisheries, held by him for sale; and

Whereas it also appears by said report that in prorating these books about the 1st of February, 1886, a mistake was made by prorating 6,000 copies instead of 5,000 copies, the actual number printed for the House. This mistake credited each member with 3 more sets of this book than they were entitled to receive, making the folding-room about 1,000 sets short of the number credited. As the mistake was not discovered for nearly eighteen months after, and very many members had in the mean time drawn the number thus placed to their credit, it was too late to fully correct the error. After it was discovered, however, 3 sets were deducted from the accounts of members who had that number still remaining to their credit, and where only 1 or 2 sets were to the credit of members the account was canceled. On account of this error there are 437 sets of this book still to the credit of members and ex-members which can not be furnished until some provision is made to supply the folding-room with that quantity of them:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be directed to withhold from sale and turn over to the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives 437 copies of the document known as "Fish and Fisheries," the same to be used in making good to the respective members of Congress entitled thereto under the joint resolution passed July 21, 1882, the deficiency occurring to them by reason of the mistake made in the prorating and distribution of such documents under said resolution.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD GRANTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, Senate bill 1430 be taken up. It would be my purpose to go on and dispose of the bill now, but the Senator from Massachusetts suggested that he wanted to see the amendment of the Senator from Florida in print, considering that it might perhaps affect some matters in which he feels an interest, and of course that can not be done until to-morrow or not until a late hour to-day. I am therefore willing that the special order shall go on, and will not ask the Senator from Michigan to further yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1430 be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. CHACE. The Senator from Michigan yields to me——

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas. I understand his colleague has the floor for to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. That is at two o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. Then it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none. It will be so ordered.

Mr. STEWART. I should like about fifteen minutes of the time to-morrow myself. I offered a resolution this morning calling for information.

Mr. HARRIS. The resolution comes up to-morrow as part of the morning business.

Mr. STEWART. I want to have that resolution considered and to say a few words about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again ask if there is objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas that to-morrow morning, after the disposition of the morning business, the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, which has been under consideration to-day, shall come up?

Mr. CHACE. The Senator from Michigan, I understand, gives way with the special order.

Mr. PLUMB. We have got through with the other matter.

Mr. CHACE. I understood that was done. There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I thought the Chair was waiting for objection.

Mr. CHACE. I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I move that the bill, with the amendments made, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I also move that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Florida as modified be specially printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I ask to have printed a proposed amendment which I send to the desk, to be offered after the amendment of the Senator from Florida is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the amendment which I propose to offer to Senate bill No. 1430 be also printed. The Senator from Michigan will offer an amendment to my amendment, which I accept, and he desires that his be printed also in connection with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, this amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. PALMER. I offer several amendments to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be included in the order to print if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I also offer an amendment which I shall propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment will be also received and printed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move a further amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I propose to insert, in the sixth line thereof, after the word "scrip" and before the words "under color of the public land laws," the words "or State selections."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This proposed amendment will also be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to offer another amendment and have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the proposed amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, and it will be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 24th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 174) granting a pension to Mary Martin;

An act (S. 472) granting a pension to Eliza Summers;

An act (S. 753) granting a pension to James D. Whaley;

An act (S. 819) granting a pension to Christopher Wisemiller; and

An act (S. 2565) to appropriate a sum of money sufficient to carry out the provisions of the act approved March 5, 1888, entitled "An act for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, also for the erection of the necessary store-houses, for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C."

The message also announced that the President had, on the 25th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

The message further announced that the President had, on the 27th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 525) for the relief of Samuel A. B. Woodford.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Mr. CHACE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 554.

Mr. PADDOCK. I had expected to take the floor to make some observations on the pleuro-pneumonia bill, but if the Senator from Rhode Island is specially anxious to proceed with the consideration of his bill I shall not interpose.

Mr. CHACE. I am much obliged to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill 554.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORRILL in section 2, after line 43, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That publishers of newspapers or other periodicals in the United States shall be allowed to copy in those publications any articles which may appear in the newspapers or other periodicals of any foreign country, and for that purpose, but not for sale, shall be allowed to import such newspapers and other periodicals.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to give notice that after the Senate shall have disposed of the international copyright bill, which I believe is now pending, and the pleuro-pneumonia bill, I shall ask the Senate to consider Calendar No. 123, being Senate bill 155 reported some time since from the Committee on the District of Columbia, relating to the manufacture and sale of gas in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, and amendatory of an act entitled "An act regulating gas-works," approved June 23, 1874.

Mr. CHACE. I am authorized by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on his behalf to withdraw his amendment. He withdraws it and proposes the amendment which I send to the desk, and which I accept. I do not like the amendment, but still as a matter of compromise, as this bill must of necessity be somewhat of a compromise, I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is withdrawn. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 31, after the words "each importation," it is proposed to insert:

And provided, That any publisher of a newspaper or magazine may without such consent import for his own use, but not for sale, not more than two copies of any newspaper or magazine published in a foreign country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to yield to me to call up a bill on the Calendar, the passage of which at this time is of considerable importance; it is a Senate bill, but it has been reported favorably in the other branch, and it will lead to no debate.

Mr. CHACE. If the bill takes any time, I certainly can not spare time.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not press it if it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks u nanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. PLUMB. Order of Business 1099, Senate bill 1747.

LEAVENWORTH WATER WORKS.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1747) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

It proposes to grant to the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company, of Leavenworth, Kans., a body corporate organized and existing under the laws of Kansas, the right to purchase from the United States that parcel and tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, beginning at a point on the north line of Metropolitan avenue in the extension of the west line of the land owned by the Leavenworth Coal Company; thence north in the extension of said west line 500 feet; thence east parallel to the north line of Metropolitan avenue 820 feet, more or less, to railroad right of way; thence on the west line of that right of way 503 feet, more or less, to the north line of Metropolitan avenue; thence west on the north line of Metropolitan avenue 850 feet, more or less, to the place of beginning; containing 9¼ acres, more or less, reserving to the United States or assigns, the coal or royalty for coal underlying the same.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the report of the board of Army officers on the subject of the value of the land in question shall not be operative until the same is approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 3, after the word "shall," to strike out "place and deposit to the credit of the United States" and insert "pay to the Secretary of War;" in line 6, after the word "such," to strike out "deposit" and insert "payment;" and in line 12, after the word "lands," to strike out—

Provided, That such deposit of the value of said lands as fixed by such appraisal shall be made within one year after receiving a copy of such appraisal from the Secretary of War.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That whenever the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company aforesaid, being thus notified of the valuation of the said lands, shall pay to the Secretary of War, in lawful money, the amount of said appraisal, and shall notify the Secretary of the Interior of such payment, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be issued to the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company a patent to the said lands, and on such deposit being made and notice to the Secretary of the Interior being given, the said company may enter upon, possess, use, and occupy the said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX., chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to allow me to give notice that at the proper time I shall move to amend, in section 2, line 19, by striking out the words "from type set;" so as to read, "printed within the limits of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no pending amendment to the bill. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. VEST. Then I move the amendment now. Let that be the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is some question about the status of an amendment suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. CHACE. I think the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is the next pending amendment. That is my recollection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I said the other day when this question was up that I objected to the bill in its present form. I desire now as briefly as I can to give my reasons for being opposed to it. I confess that I am not fully advised in regard to all its provisions, but there are several amendments I would be glad to vote for. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] I think ought to be adopted, and the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] in regard to magazines strikes me as being one which would remove a very objectionable feature from the bill, but as I am paired on all questions connected with the measure with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent from the Senate and, therefore, can not vote on the measnre, he being in favor and I opposed to it, I shall content myself with stating the reasons why I object to it. Going back to what occurred heretofore, the other day I asked a question of the Senator from Arkansas, whether this measure was not based solely on the constitutional provision which I will read:

Congress—

Among its other powers—

shall have the power to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

I did that because it does not seem to me so much a bill for that purpose as a measure to give an absolute monopoly to a few favored publishers in the United States in combination with foreign authors and typographical unions to have the printing and publishing all done here, so as to increase the price of all works that are the product of foreign thought to the great mass of the American people; not to promote science and the useful arts, but for the purpose of curtailing the means of knowledge, or at any rate for the purpose of enhancing the price of all things that tend to develop science or the useful arts in printed form.

I agree also with the Senator from Arkansas in his criticisms in regard to the portions of the bill which seemed to him to be fatal to it as a Senate bill. The Senator from Arkansas objected very decidedly to the provision introduced by the Senate Committee on Patents, which I may as well read again and comment upon, believing as I do that it controvenes the constitutional provision which requires all measures affecting taxation on imports or modification of existing laws on that subject to originate in the House of Representatives.

During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book or other article so copyrighted shall be, and it hereby is, prohibited, except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation. All officers of customs and postmasters are hereby required to seize and destroy all copies of such prohibited articles as shall be entered at the custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States, or transmitted to the mails of the United States.

It seems to me to be a bill of pains and penalties, upsetting and destroying the present revenue system to the extent that it proposes to deal with the question of taxation in regard to books, periodicals, pamphlets, maps, lithographs, and everything else covered by copyright laws. The Senator from Missouri seemed surprised at my criticism of the measure in that regard; he thought I made a discovery which was wholly untenable, but I think he will find when he comes to look at the matter carefully that we are dealing with a very grave subject. We have to-day on the free-list:

Books and other printed matter, not elsewhere specified: Books, engravings, bound or unbound, etchings, maps, and charts, which have been printed and manufactured more than twenty years at the time of importation.

This proposed copyright law is to extend a prohibition against all copyrighted books for forty-two years, and repeals the provision in regard to books for twenty-two years during the life of the copyright, to begin with. Then follows, on the free-list:

Books, maps, and charts, imported by authority or for the use of the Library of Congress.

Books, maps, and charts, imported by authority or for the use of the United States other than the Library of Congress.

Books, maps, and charts, specially imported, not more than two copies in any one invoice, in good faith, for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosopical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Mr. CHACE. Would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Not at all.

Mr. CHACE. Does the Senator believe that this bill interferes with what he now reads?

Mr. BECK. I think it does.

Mr. CHACE. If he will look at the bill he will see that section 2505 of the Revised Statutes is specially excepted in it.

Mr. BECK. Section 2505 makes books free that are over twenty years of age at the time of their importation.

Mr. CHACE. That is the section he is reading now.

Mr. BECK. This measure extends the exclusion of all copyrighted works now free under the copyright for how long? For forty-two years?

Mr. CHACE. Yes, twenty-eight and fourteen years. This is simply an extension of the principles of the domestic law to foreign authors in that respect, but does not in any way affect the operation of section 2505 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BECK. Does not this bill give to a foreign author the same right the domestic author has?

Mr. CHACE. So far as the period of time is concerned.

Mr. BECK. Therefore it gives the right to the foreign author for forty-two years, does it not?

Mr. CHACE. Exactly. In other words, if it will not interrupt the Senator from Kentucky, with his permission I will say right here that we have at present what is sometimes called a domestic copyright law, that is, a law granting copyright to American authors who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. BECK. Or residents therein?

Mr. CHACE. Yes. Now, this bill, as I understand it, simply extends those privileges to foreign authors and puts upon foreign authors the same conditions precisely. I believe without a single exception the same conditions are put upon the foreign author that are now put upon the domestic author by our present laws.

Mr. BECK. And yet no foreign book when copyrighted under this bill unless it is forty-two years old can hereafter be brought to this country, can it?

Mr. CHACE. Oh, it can to-day. The Senator does not mean at present. Under our present law you can bring in foreign books.

Mr. BECK. Free if they are over twenty years old?

Mr. CHACE. No foreigner can get a copyright here now.

Mr. BECK. But any book can now be brought from abroad if it is not copyrighted here after it is over twenty years old.

Mr. CHACE. No copyrighted book can be brought into this country. There is an absolute prohibition under our present statute.

Mr. BECK. Unless it is forty-two years old?

Mr. CHACE. Under the present statute there is an absolute prohibition of the importation of any copyrighted book. That is a provision of the present law.

Mr. BECK. What I was trying to say is, that this bill in that respect interferes with our present tariff regulations in regard to both the free-list and the dutiable list, and is a change in our tax laws so far as the twenty years are concerned; but that was merely incidental. If the books of foreigners are copyrighted here and the same right is given to foreign authors and publishers that is given to an American author, publisher, or owner, it repeals necessarily the provision in regard to books twenty years old, because the copyright law extends their copyright for forty-two years, does it not? I think it does, beyond question. Another clause of the existing tariff law is:

Books or libraries, or parts of libraries, in use of persons or families from foreign countries, if used abroad by them not less than one year, and not intended for any other person or persons, nor for sale—are now free. That right would certainly be cut off so far as imported books copyrighted here by foreign authors are concerned. Professional books of persons living in the United States are free, and newspapers and periodicals are now free.

The value of books thus brought in for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, amounted to $384,752; and under the dutiable list the books subject to a 25 per cent. tax, which embraced books, maps, engravings, etchings, pamphlets (bound or unbound), drawings, illustrated books, maps, and charts, the value of these goods now brought in amounted, for the fiscal year which closed on the 30th of June last, to $2,736,137.70, and the duty collected thereon was $684,004.10. That source of revenue is of course all taken away by this copyright bill.

Therefore, I repeat that it is as much a tax bill or a money bill, which the Senate can not originate, where you strike things off the free-list and prohibit their importation, or where you prohibit the importation of books or other things on which duty is now collected, as it is to impose a tax for revenue upon them, and it has been always so held by both Houses of Congress. We might as well say that it would not be interfering with the existing tariff laws in regard to woolens to prohibit the introduction of woolen goods into this country. By this bill we are interfering with the existing revenue system as to books and periodicals by abolishing the free-list and to the extent of $684,000 of duty collected in the last fiscal year on those subject to 25 per cent. duty now. Therefore I claimed the other day and say now that in my opinion that feature of it is in the nature of a money bill, which must originate in the House of Representatives.

But waiving all that, the claim is asserted that foreign authors, publishers, and purchasers of printed matter have a right to a monopoly of the American market by copyright. All the men who appeared before the committee to obtain this legislation to enrich themselves at the public expense have denounced the Congress of the United States as guilty of robbery, piracy, and dishonesty in all its forms for withholding from them the monopoly they have combined to demand. I think they had better be a little more modest in their demands. "Pirates," "robbers," and "thieves" seem to be the mildest words that can be applied by them to any of those who do not agree to tax the people so as to give them all they demand.

They would think very hard if I was to apply epithets to them because they are not willing—and they are not willing even for the promotion of the arts and sciences—to give foreign authors the right to bring their productions into this country free and unhampered under copyright laws, so the people of the United States can get books on the same terms as the people of other countries. They have entered into combinations with the great publishing houses of the leading cities in this country and with typographic unions of these cities, so that the monopoly of publishing and printing at any price shall be had by a few houses in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, who have formed a pool as absolute as the steel rail, the copper, or any other trust, which pool is to control the price of every book that comes from abroad. Even the type has to be set in these cities, so as to enhance the cost of literature to every man who uses a book, and they call that benignant and enlightened legislation under the constitutional provision authorizing Congress to promote the progress of science and useful arts among the people.

Whenever a bill has been brought in which looked to that end, and that end alone, without the protective monopoly features of this measure, and simply gave the foreign authors the same chance as our own, all the men in this country who wanted a monopoly of the work, the printers and the publishers, rose up in arms against it. They defeated it in the last Congress, even after the Senator from Rhode Island ventured to approve the bill of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], as I will show in a few minutes. Mr. President, the truth is, unless the foreign copyright can be had in the form of a monopoly; unless it can be so adjusted as to double the cost to the American reader; unless the organized bands can put money into their own pockets by a combination of the foreign authors and owners of books, the home publishers and the home type-setters, so as to make every book that is allowed to reach the hands of the American reader cost twice as much as it does to-day, they do not want the bill.

For one, I deny that there is either dishonesty, wrong, or piracy in withholding the privilege now sought from foreign authors and magazine owners, even if the bill were stripped of all the obnoxious features to which I have just referred. Whatever may have been the contest in England, and it was long maintained and well sustained on both sides, as to the common-law right of an author to the exclusive profits in and right to his works, the American doctrine has always been, and the framers of the Constitution adopted it, that there was the same right in the inventor to an invention as there was to a book written by an author; that they stood upon a plane exactly alike, and that there was no common-law right of absolute property in either. The men who framed the Constitution of the United States assumed that the man who wrote a book or the man who invented a machine of any sort was not the absolute owner of it for all time; that when he sold it, and got the money for it, the purchasers became the owners, and but for the protection the Constitution authorized Congress to throw around him, his title was gone the moment he made his sale.

Therefore they inserted this provision not to secure the title in the writer or inventor, not for the purpose of putting money in his pocket by a monopoly, but "to promote the progress of science and useful arts" Congress was authorized to secure "for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Each was put upon an equal footing.

Congress did in 1790 secure to home authors for fourteen years the exclusive right to their publications, with the right to renew for fourteen years more. That was the foundation of the right of an author to his works in America.

But for that law anybody who bought any book or periodical could have published it. The constitutional provision and the acts passed under it assumed that the author and the inventor could have no legal property in either except by statute law, and that could only be given for a limited time, because the Constitution did not even give the power to Congress to give to the author the absolute right to the works he wrote, nor to the inventor the right for more than a limited period to the invention that he had made; and the very fact that Congress could give it only for a limited time was a confession that there was no absolute legal property in it at common law.

If the book was the absolute property of the man from the moment he wrote it, or if the invention was the absolute property of the man who invented it, would the framers of the Constitution of the United States have said that Congress could give the exclusive right to them for only a limited time? Would it not have been as much a wrong to have deprived either of property if it was his absolutely after the expiration of fourteen or twenty-eight years as it was before the expiration of the fourteen or the twenty-eight years? Of course it would. Did anybody ever suppose that a provision could be placed in the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to give a man a right for a limited time to the land that he had purchased or to any other property that he absolutely owned? No; it was because authors and inventors were placed together in the same category, and in order to promote arts and science Congress was authorized to give them for a limited time rights such as the constitutional provision authorized.

The Supreme Court at a very early day, then, as now, a very able body of lawyers, in a somewhat celebrated case where the whole question was argued on both sides elaborately, in Wheaton and Donaldson vs. Peters and Grigg, settled the question. The court was composed at that time of Hon. John Marshall, Chief-Justice; Hon. William Johnson, Hon. Gabriel Duvall, Hon. Joseph Story, Hon. Smith Thompson, Hon. John McLean, and Hon. Henry Baldwin, and in the opinion delivered in 8 Peters five of the judges agreed. The opinion was written by Justice McLean and sanctioned by Chief-Justice Marshall, Johnson, Duvall, and Story. It is a long opinion. I only propose to call attention to it and read a few extracts. After discussing the question as presented in England in the case of Miller vs. Taylor, which had gone to the House of Lords, and various other decisions under the statute of Anne, the court say:

> That an author, at common law, has a property in his manuscript and may obtain redress against any one who deprives him of it, or by improperly obtaining a copy, endeavors to realize a profit by its publication, can not be doubted; but this is a very different right from that which asserts a perpetual and exclusive property in the future publication of the work after the author shall have published it to the world.
> The argument that a literary man is as much entitled to the product of his labor as any other member of society can not be controverted. And the answer is that he realizes this product by the transfer of his manuscripts or in the sale of his works when first published.

That covers the whole question.

Mr. President, there are very many other people who are not protected in the product of their skill. After the thing they invent or think out is sold they have to take the chances with the persons they sell to when they make the sale. I have no doubt, and the ladies of the country I suppose would agree, that the French dress-maker who spends years and years in devising how to make up a magnificent dress which excites the envy of all women everywhere, or a fine, stylish bonnet, is a public benefactor; yet after she has spent years of time and talent in producing them, the moment she sells either it goes into the shops of New York and elsewhere and everybody makes others like it ad libitum, and nobody assumes or admits that she has any right to a monopoly in the manufacture and sale of that dress or that bonnet, no matter how many years of labor it may have cost her to originate it.

Mr. KENNA. No lady wants a dress just like another.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps they do not all desire it to be exactly the same, but a good many do. They use the idea of the original inventor. It is certainly as much piracy to take away the labor of that person who has spent years to invent either the dress or the bonnet or anything else as it is to publish in this country a magazine article that is written by some man in Europe who was paid there for his work; especially as we are under no sort of obligation to protect him or the man who hires him to write.

Let me say to my friend from West Virginia that the magazine article or the book written in Germany, England, France, or anywhere else, is written very often by men who are employed to write those articles, and who are always employed without any reference to the American market. They get their pay from the publisher. The publisher owns the manuscript they furnish. He publishes it. It was their brains, not his, that furnished it; but it becomes his absolute property. The proposed copyright is to protect him who bought, not him who thought, and when he sells it to me in Europe, but for the statute law, the moment it becomes mine it is as much mine as the bonnet or the dress purchased from those who got them up, and I can make as many more like it as I please, because I have bought it and paid my money for it.

The publisher pays somebody else to do the work. The man who was the real author of the article that is of value has no interest in this copyright that we are talking about now; but the man who hired him and paid him, and who invested none of his own brains in it, has sold it to me, and, though he is an alien to the United States, he is now trying, by combinations with others here who want to make money by the scheme, to induce Congress for forty-two years to compel the people of America to give him the right to have the exclusive monopoly of it. In consideration of that he agrees to enter into a combination with the publishing houses of New York, and with the type-setters there, to see to it that the American people do not get the work as cheaply by at least one-half as they otherwise would. But returning to the decision I was reading from, the court goes on to say——

Mr. VEST. May I interrupt my friend just a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand him to assert that the right to take out this copyright does not enhance the value of the literary productions of the author? In other words, without that copyright would not the author get infinitely less for his literary production than he does with the copyright; and is not the Senator now attacking the whole doctrine of copyright?

Mr. BECK. No; let me state my position. I say that there is no absolute property in the work.

Mr. VEST. That is not the question.

Mr. BECK. I say that the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to grant for a limited time for the promotion of art and science to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective works. We have done that so far as the citizens of the United States or the residents thereof are concerned, first, for fourteen years with a right of renewal for fourteen more; then in 1831 we extended it to twenty-eight years with the right to the widow and children of the original author for fourteen more; but the absolute property remained in the people. We have never been under any obligation, nor is there right anywhere recognized which requires Congress to give foreign authors the same right that we give to our own people. That is a matter ex gratia.

Mr. VEST. But that does not settle this question at all. With all due deference to the Senator, that is not the proposition before the Senate. Nobody contends that there is an absolute right to literary production. Mr. Jefferson argued that question better than any other man ever could have done in this country, in the fifth volume of his works. The Constitution of the United States simply announced the doctrine that there was a right for a limited number of years in the production of a man's brains; that is all. An American citizen goes to England—I can go there to-morrow and write a book, print it in England, and receive exactly the same copyright that an English citizen does. The United States, on the contrary, adopts a rule which no other civilized country in the world has, and it says to a foreigner as soon as he puts his foot on this soil, "We protect our people in their intellectual productions, but we will not protect you." That is the whole question before the Senate to-day.

Mr. BECK. Our copyright law gives not only to citizens of the United States but residents of the United States the right to take out a copyright. The law of England requires the same condition as to residence to-day. The law of Russia requires the same thing. The law of Germany requires it; and with all the talk about piracy here and robbery by us, no American citizen can copyright a book in England unless he is a resident and on English soil at the time the publication is made. He can not do it in Russia; he can not do it in Germany. To-day every American book by every American author in all time past which has been republished there has been "pirated," if you please, to the same extent that we are charged with being guilty of piracy in publishing their works.

It has been assumed all through this argument that we were standing alone in refusing this right. I have before me the statement made before the committee by Mr. Curtis. I may as well call attention to that now, for I have no order of proceeding in making these observations. George Ticknor Curtis was examined before the committee.

Mr. CHACE. On what page is that?

Mr. BECK. That is on page 17 of the last year's report. George Ticknor Curtis said:

> The condition of affairs between this country and England as regards an American author is simply this: That if you go there and reside and publish your book, or a part of it, before it is published in the United States, you can secure what is supposed to be a copyright, which does not rest on any provision of a statute, but has resulted as a sort of judicial understanding based upon several judicial decisions which have been made. But it perils your American copyright. I have given many and many professional opinions upon those very points, and have endeavored to discover in what way you can practically secure a copyright in England without periling or putting in jeopardy your American copyright.
> Now, sir, I want to say in regard to this Hawley bill that it seems to me it is very desirable that you should affirm the principle of what may be called reciprocity.

The Hawley bill, I may as well say here, was a bill simply giving equal rights to authors in each country. That was protested against by all the publishers of the Eastern States and by all the typographic unions here, because they were not to get their share of the monopoly. As I shall show presently, the Hawley bill contained a provision which required the President of the United States to proclaim, before the law of copyright went into effect to give foreigners the rights that this bill now seeks to give them, that England had given our authors the same rights. That guaranty of equal rights this bill leaves out; it proposes to give the right to all foreign authors, although our American authors may be excluded, as they are to-day excluded, unless they are residents of the country in which they seek the right to have a copyright. Mr. Curtis goes on to say:

> But I am perfectly satisfied that although you may put that law on your statute-book as it stands, pure and simple (and it is a very important declaration and I advocate it), yet unless you follow it up immediately, or very soon, with practical measures to reconcile all these various conflicting interests of the manufacturers of the book in different countries, and to reconcile the state of things not only as between us and England, but as between England and the continent, and ourselves and the continent, it will simply remain a declaration of a broad principle on the statute-book and no benefit to American authors will grow out of it.
> I have had the unfortunate experience in the course of my life to be the author of several books which have had sales in England. I never derived anything from those sales; neither did my American publisher derive anything from them. The books were not books of a popular character; they were law books, or histories, or biographies, or something of that kind. I have a book in press at this moment in New York which I should copyright in England, France, Germany, and Belgium if I had the power to secure a valid legal copyright and make it the basis of an arrangement with publishers.

He was then asked again: "Is there not a mistake about that; is there not an order in council they can issue?" Mr. Sedgwick said:

> If you will turn to page 6 of our pamphlet you will see that this bill was based on the statute of 7 and 8 Victoria, of the 10th of May, 1844, which provides that the queen may declare by an order in council that authors shall have the privilege of copyright during such period as shall be defined in such order, etc. The theory of the bill is, that by the passage of the Hawley bill, international copyright will come at once into existence.
> Mr. CURTIS. You have first to get them to make that order in council.
>
> Mr. SEDGWICK. That has been done so many times that I believe there would be no difficulty about it.
> Mr. CURTIS. That depends on circumstances and the relations between the different countries.

So I had supposed, until this argument began and the Senator from Rhode Island was talking about our standing alone and behind every other country in the world, that all the other countries protected our authors and were giving us rights that we were not giving to them, and that we were simply playing the pirate or the robber (I think that is what he called us several times) in withholding from them rights that they were giving us. When you come to analyze it and examine it in this pamphlet the laws of Russia and Germany as well as England are set forth, and those gentlemen agree that none of those countries have to-day given to our authors any of the rights that they are now demanding for English and other foreign authors. But I am not done with what the court said. Beginning where I left off in the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Wheaton and Donaldson vs. Peters and Grigg, the court continued:

> A book is valuable on account of the matter it contains, the ideas it communicates, the instruction or entertainment it affords. Does the author hold a perpetual property in these? Is there an implied contract by every purchaser of his book that he may realize whatever instruction or entertainment which the reading of it shall give, but shall not write out or print its contents?
> In what respect does the right of an author differ from that of an individual who has invented a most useful and valuable machine? In the production of this his mind has been as intensely engaged as long and perhaps as usefully to the public as any distinguished author in the composition of his book.

Yet the court go on to say that the inventor never claimed he had any right at all except what Congress saw fit to give him. With all the apparent reciprocity that exists between our patentees and the patentees of other countries, an American patentee can not get a patent in England to-day if he takes his patent out in America first and the fact is published in the American Gazette before he takes out the English patent. The very moment it is published in the Gazette of our Patent Office that deprives him of the right to take out any patent in England at all. England only grants a patent for fourteen years; we grant a patent for seventeen; France, I believe, grants patents for eight years; other countries grant for as low as two or three years; so that there is no reciprocity even under the patent laws, though they have been made as liberal as they could be made by all sorts of efforts. After the court had argued the whole question elaborately, they say:

> That Congress, in passing the act of 1790, did not legislate in reference to existing rights, appears clear, from the provision that the author, etc., "shall have the sole right and liberty of printing," etc.
> Now, if this exclusive right existed at common law, and Congress were about to adopt legislative provisions for its protection would they have used this language? Could they have deemed it necessary to vest a right already vested? Such a presumption is refuted by the words above quoted, and their force is not lessened by any other part of the act.
> Congress, then, by this act of 1790, instead of sanctioning an existing right, as contended for, created it. This seems to be the clear import of the law, connected with the circumstances under which it was enacted.

Then they argued elaborately in order to show that to be the true construction of our Constitution. That being the case, a power being given to Congress under the Constitution to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, every bill until this bill, so far as I know, has proceeded upon that theory. I have looked over the bills introduced. One was introduced by Mr. Clay. I introduced a bill myself at the request of some gentlemen February 21, 1872, which I hold in my hand, and which reads thus:

Be it enacted, etc., That the author of a manuscript for a book, map, chart, or design in English, or any other language, who is not a citizen of the United States of America, may obtain a copyright on his work or book on the following terms and conditions: Before his work is first published, or for sale in this country, the title-page thereof must be recorded in the office of the Librarian of Congress; the work to be free to be printed and published by all responsible publishers; the copyright not to exceed 10 per cent. on the selling price. The author shall have an agent prepared to make contracts, notice of which shall be given through the public press.

SEC. 2. That if the author should fail to comply with the above requirements, the book, map, chart, or design may be republished the same as might have been done before the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act is to prevent the importation or sale of the foreign edition of said work.

Perhaps even that was going too far. I do not know. Bills introduced during former Congresses contained the same provisions. None of them had the features of monopoly and combination contained in this. The bill introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was made a part of the report of the committee reporting this bill. It provided simply—

That the citizens of foreign States and countries of which the laws, treaties, or conventions confer, or shall hereafter confer, upon citizens of the United States rights of copyright equal to those accorded to their own citizens, shall have in the United States rights of copyright equal to those enjoyed by citizens of the United States.

Predicated upon the idea that that right was to accrue to them when they gave it to us.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any book or other subject of copyright published before the date hereof.

SEC. 3. That the laws now in force in regard to copyright shall be applicable to the copyright hereby created, except so far as the said laws are hereinafter amended or repealed.

SEC. 4. That section 4971 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed; section 4954 is amended by striking out the words "and a citizen of the United States or resident therein;" section 4967 is amended by striking out the words "if such author or proprietor is a citizen of the United States or resident therein."

SEC. 5. That the proclamation of the President of the United States that such equality of rights exists in any country shall be conclusive proof of such equality.

That is as far as any one ever ventured to go, so far as I am aware, in asking this privilege for foreigners until this bill now introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island came before us. He is not content with General HAWLEY's bill, but he has to organize a great combination of monopolists, strike down the tariff laws of the land, strike down the free-list, require the type to be set in this country, and require the American publishers to have control of the work so that they can form their pools and combinations and put up the price of every book that the reading public of America will wish to read.

This proposition is protection gone mad. Yet we are told that there is no protection in it. Trusts, pools, combinations, exclusive rights to certain men, and the type of every book to be set in the United States and done at the same time before a single foreign book can come, and he may claim a copyright; not content with that, it makes the postmasters and custom-house officers judges of rights to property, with power to seize and destroy without trial, without hearing, without even giving men a chance to show that they are bringing their property into the country under the laws, or that the men who claim the copyright have not complied with the obligation that gave them a right to claim copyright, they are to seize and destroy all copies of the works pretended to be copyrighted.

Think of such a power granted to postmasters and custom-house officers, even the little pretense of right that the bill gives of allowing persons purchasing for use and not for sale two copies at a time, or under section 2505 of the Revised Statutes, to which the Senator called my attention a little while ago, which means books over twenty years of age when imported. What provision does he make? Under the provision of the Revised Statutes old books are allowed to come in, and the law also allows two copies to be brought in by persons purchasing them for their own use. What does the Senator provide in his bill?

In each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation.

The proprietor of that copyright might be in St. Petersburgh and the goods might come from Liverpool. He might be in Australia and the goods might be coming from another part of the world. Yet this committee, whose spokesman the Senator from Rhode Island is, will not even allow a single copy to come in for a college, for a school, for any purpose whatever, nor even an old book over twenty years of age, unless in each case the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright in the presence of two witnesses shall be furnished with each importation.

I should like to know if there ever was a provision as prohibitory as that in any law that did not absolutely prohibit the thing from coming? That is done, too, under the constitutional provision which authorizes Congress to pass laws "to promote the progress of science and useful arts." We have by act of Congress now given authority to libraries and colleges and to professional men to bring the books that they need for their schools and their libraries; but this bill cuts them off unless they can hunt all over the world and obtain the written consent in the presence of two witnesses of the man who claims to be the proprietor of the copyright, and if that written consent of the proprietor can not be obtained, any customs officer or any postmaster shall in transitu stop the importation of the book, no matter whether it may be going to churches, colleges, or schools, or for scientific purposes, and destroy it, without giving the man who owned it even a hearing. If that is not robbery and piracy, if I may use terms so freely used by the advocates of this measure, I know not what to call it. If there is anything in the conduct of those of us who object to a bill like that that comes as near being entitled to be called by those opprobrious names as that provision, I am mistaken.

Congress had this question up in a much milder form than it is now before the Joint Committee on the Library in 1873. I said the other day I would refer to that report. I have it in my hand; it is a report made on the 7th day of February, 1873, being report 409, third session of the Forty-second Congress. It was made by Mr. Morrill, of Maine, from the Joint Committee on the Library, which consisted of Lot M. Morrill, of Maine; JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio; Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, on the part of the Senate; John A. Peters, of Maine; William A. Wheeler, of New York; and Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, on the part of the House. The report, so far as I have observed, was unanimous. I ask that the report, which is only three pages long, with some tables of prices, be published as part of my remarks in the RECORD. It will save taking the time of the Senate to read it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

The Joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the resolution directing them to inquire into the practicability of securing to authors the benefit of international copyright, report:

That, after attentive consideration of the subject-matter, they have found the question of international copyright attended with grave practical difficulties and of doubtful expediency, not to say of questionable authority.

At the outset of the examination much embarrassing contrariety of opinion between those who demand the measure as a just recognition of the rights of authors to their works and those representing the manifold interests, occupations, and domestic industries involved in the contemplated legislation became conspicuous; in the prominency and fervor of which the primary motive of any and all contemplated constitutional action, namely, the promotion of the progress of science and the useful arts, seemed—unconsciously, of course—likely to be overcast.

On behalf of authors and artists it is insisted that Congress owes it to universal authorship to grant protection to literary and scientific productions, irrespective of nationality, as a matter of justice and right; that the Constitution in this respect, as in the case of domestic authors, is mandatory in its character; that the mode and manner of such protection are prescribed in terms in its provisions; and that none other than the mode prescribed is at all allowable, leaving Congress no discretion in the premises; and that not to legislate in this behalf is to refuse the performance of an obvious duty; and that, having by the law of copyright secured to domestic authors exclusive rights to their works, thereby recognizing the obligation of protection to authorship, Congress stands derelict in the performance of its whole duty in that it has not provided equal protection to universal authorship.

Upon the soundness and cogency of this proposition both American and foreign authors are understood generally to be agreed.

A portion of the American publishers (and they are among the most important) are willing to accede to the demand of the authors upon the condition of satisfactory stipulations as to the medium of communication with the American public through their publishing houses; while the authors divide on the question of publication, a portion, not illogically, insisting upon the supposed duty of absolute protection without stint, limit, or condition, and a part are disposed to yield to the terms of the publishers; and this adjustment of the matter, it is supposed, would redound to the progress of science and the arts.

A portion, and much the larger number of domestic publishers, are understood to be either hostile to the whole subject of international copyright, or consider all action in regard to it at least of questionable utility to the world of letters, and especially to the progress of science and the arts in this country and among our own people.

The printers, type-founders, binders, paper-makers, and others engaged in the manufacture of books, in large numbers remonstrate against the measure as calculated to diminish the popular sale and circulation of books, by raising the price thereof, and thus prejudicial to this branch of industry.

These classes, interests, and industries have been ably represented before the committee, and it may be observed that from these the measure is invested with its special interest, as we are not aware of any popular representation or demand, by memorial or remonstrance, or otherwise, on behalf of either book buyers or readers or the mass of the people.

The protection in his works that the author demands, it will be noticed, is an absolute and exclusive right of property therein. To all such appeals to Congress (without entering into the consideration of such a pretension as an abstract proposition), it is deemed sufficient to reply that the framers of the Constitution did not seem to have apprehended the justice of a claim so extensive on the part of authors, nor to have contemplated the promotion of the progress of science by legislation so partial and engrossing as that proposed; but, on the contrary, in the interests of science, and altogether subservient to its ends, and as an incentive to authorship to enter into its service, did provide for the enjoyment in their works of an especial privilege for a limited period.

The nature of the prerogative conferred, its use and limitations, are, each and all, alike inconsistent with the assumed rights; and whatever abstract rights of property the author may be supposed to have in his production, it is clear that his appeal to Congress for protection can be recognized only within the express limitations of the Constitution.

It became important, in the outset, to bring to the examination of the subject a just appreciation of the provision of the Constitution in relation to it. That provision is as follows: Congress shall have power "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

All opinions, interests, policies, and economies must be brought to the test of this clause of the Constitution, in which the objects and manner of legislation are clearly expressed, and must constitute the rule of action upon the sub ect.

It may be proper to remark that the policy of national copyright does not necessarily enter into the discussion. It may be assumed that the Constitution not only contemplated such legislation, but that such action is supposed to be consistent with and in the interest of science, and tends to its progress. Nor is it supposed that a question properly arises as to the abstract rights of the author in his writings; neither is it important to consider whether any such rights had been recognized in England or in the American States anterior to the Constitution, as these rights do not constitute the object nor form the basis of that legislative action contemplated in the Constitution.

The constitutional provision is primarily in the interest of science, to which the rights and interests of authors are subordinated, and with which they are not necessarily in all respects identical. The very terms of the instrument are a limitation on the power of Congress against the recognition of such absolute right, thus "by securing for limited times to authors exclusive right to their writings."

The precise question is, are the terms of the Constitution equally applicable to international copyright, and would their application "promote the progress of science?"

The language is sufficiently comprehensive, doubtless, to include all authorship. But in construing the Constitution reference should be had to the condition of affairs at the period of its adoption, the obvious intent of the framers, as gathered from contemporaneous history, and must receive such construction as will carry out the object in view.

It was, it should be observed, to constitute, in a qualified sense, a government in the interests of the people of the United States. Its framers would not, therefore, be expected to be solicitous for the protection of individual rights of those alien to its jurisdiction, nor were the circumstances of their national position such as were calculated to invite to the consideration of topics so eminently international in their operations and relations.

Besides, it must be borne in mind that the Constitution of the United States antedates all legislation upon international copyright in any country; that no thought of such a law was suggested to the convention that framed that instrument. Nor are there to be found in the history of the times such sentiments and opinions upon the subject as to justify a reasonable supposition that such a proposition could have been present in the minds of those who proposed the particular provision. It may be safe, therefore, to assume that international copyright was not within the contemplation of the Constitution, whatever interpretation the language may be thought to be susceptible of.

To the argument as to the mandatory character of the provision in the interests of universal authorship, it may be replied that none but citizens could properly lay claim to protection of individual rights, and that, under the Constitution, these were all subordinated to the interests of science, and that whoever invokes the protection of the one must show that his demand is, at least, compatible with the other.

Whether the Constitution, in what it provides, is to be regarded as mandatory or permissive, confined to American or domestic authors, or extended to foreign or alien, in spirit and intent, it demands, as a primary, essential, and paramount consideration, that whatever is done in its name shall be in the interest of and for the promotion of the progress of science. In the presence of this paramount object all rights of authors, publishers, booksellers, and book-makers must needs take a secondary place in legislative consideration. Nor is it less certain that herein lies the true interest of all genuine authorship.

A demand for copyright, national or international, as a measure of protection to a property right simply, necessarily tends to sink the question of science to the level of a commercial transaction, and subjects it to the odium of an indefensible monopoly. It is only when considered as a tribute to genius, the quality and beneficence of whose productions are of universal recognition in the world of letters, that science and authorship become identical. It can not be doubted that if, under undue stimulus of national copyright, the quality of literary productions should become inferior, commonplace, and baneful, Congress, in the interest of science, could apply the remedy by limiting the privilege or denying it altogether.

It has even been said that a tendency in this direction already exists; that authors who write for fame are growing fewer, and that writers who write merely for money are multiplying; that, in short, the relations between writers on one side, and publishers and the public on the other, are growing more mercenary; but this may be said to arise from the fact that the men of true genius who are really entitled to the honorable name of American authors are confounded with men who have no just claim to such a distinction.

A question fairly arises and presents itself at the threshold of any proposition of copyright, whether this commercial spirit is identical with and friendly to the progress of science. Considering the undeniable fact that a larger portion of authors are now writing for gain than formerly, and that publishers have come to estimate their writings by the profits likely to accrue from their publications, can it be inferred that from such a union of literature and commerce the highest interests of science are likely to be promoted?

Under the influence of this union can it be denied that a class of books are put upon the market which in literary quality bear slight resemblance to the productions of genius, and others where the attribute of authorship could not well be discovered? and yet these all seek shelter under the law of copyright, and enjoy that exclusive privilege designed alone for genius and the votaries of science.

While doubtless the constitutional provision had its origin in the belief in the identity of the interests of authorship and science, it is true that the law of copyright, as it lies in the Constitution, is not the protection of authors as an object—not as the reward of genius independent of science, but as an incentive to the former in the interests of the latter.

Is the question of authorship in its relations to science so simple and of such universal application as to be productive of equally beneficial results when subjected to the method of the Constitution as a rule for the different nations and differing conditions of letters therein?

Authorship, standing by itself, although the essential element, still, it is not all the world of letters, and can not in any measure, having at heart the interests of literature, be considered as standing independent and by itself. If it be conceded to be the soul of science, it is essential that its productions should be embodied in books, and these involve the varied skill, industries, and cunning workmanship of many hands, and at last, and not the least important agency, the enterprise, capital, and address of the publisher through whom these books are to be introduced to the reading public.

These interests press upon the legislator at the very threshold of any measure of international copyright, demanding consideration and protection. The right conferred upon the foreign author, a variety of questions of labor, art, skill, and the like, enter into the practical question, and force upon consideration the chances of ruinous monopolies at the world's great book centers, when competition and a provident share in opportunities would seem to be our necessity.

The question before us is not national copyright, but whether the monopoly of the foreigner in his work, enjoyed in his land, can, in the interest of science, fairly be claimed for him in every land where his work may be printed. The English author has the exclusive privilege secured to him as an incentive to his genius. Does it need the further stimulus of privilege in other lands? And if so, can such privilege be considered as demanded in the interests of literature, or would the fruits of such encouragement compensate for the natural repression of the diffusion of knowledge?

Assuming now that the measure can not be commended or rightfully demanded in the interest of authors alone, nor in that of authors and publishers combined, it remains to be seen whether the facts justify the conclusion that the measure can be granted in the interests of science.

It will doubtless be conceded that international copyright would have the effect to enhance the price of books of foreign authorship in the American market, and a tendency and the probable effect to increase the price of the American copyrighted book in our own market.

While it may be conceded that the tendency of the law of copyright is to stimulate the production of literary and scientific works, it is believed to be equally true that one of its effects is to repress the popular circulation of such works. Such, it is apparent, must be its natural tendency, and such is understood to be the fact in this country and in England, especially the latter. As a general proposition, during the existence of copyright, the interests of both publisher and author are best consulted by a small edition and consequent limited circulation, as a larger profit may be realized from a small edition at high rates than the reverse. Notable instances may be given in proof of this general proposition in England and our own country. The average price of seventy-five English books, as given below, is $5.60, and the average price of the American reprints of the same books is only $2.40.

From the above exhibits it would seem clear that the law of copyright, as existing in England and this country, in its practical operations in the two countries, tends unmistakably to check the popular diffusion of literary production by largely increasing the price. This fact could be further illustrated by recurrence to the vast disproportion in the sale of the cheaper reprints and the copyrighted editions in both countries.

England is the great book-making and producing nation with which this country has to do, and, consequently, our interests would be most affected by the proposed measure; and that such measure would not promote the progress of science and the useful arts among the American people is believed to be obvious and to admit of little doubt.

The policy of the different states of Europe as to the protection of literary property varies as to the period of time for which it is granted. In England and in this country the protection is ample. The prevailing policy among the nations seems to be to grant such protection to literary property as is deemed a proper incentive to production.

It is questionable whether any system of international copyright could be proposed which would be equally beneficial or just, owing to the different languages prevailing among them.

In view of the whole case, your committee are satisfied that no form of international copyright can fairly be urged upon Congress upon reasons of general equity or of constitutional law; that the adoption of any plan for the purpose which has been laid before us would be of very doubtful advantage to American authors as a class, and would be not only an unquestionable and permanent injury to the manufacturing interests concerned in producing books, but a hinderance to the diffusion of knowledge among the people and to the cause of universal education; that no plan for the protection of foreign authors has yet been devised which can unite the support of all or nearly all who profess to be favorable to the general object in view; and that, in the opinion of your committee, any project for an international copyright will be found upon mature deliberation to be inexpedient.

Mr. BECK. That report goes so far as to show that instead of being a benefit to the people of this country to grant those rights to foreign authors when we have not received them from foreign countries, that instead of being an act to promote the progress of science and the arts, it was an act to promote a monopoly, to increase the prices of books, and to deprive the great mass of the people from getting the benefits they are now deriving from the law as it now exists.

The tables, which are part of the report, show the American prices, the prices in England, and the prices of the books now furnished to the American people under the right to publish them free, and they show that we are getting a majority of the best books of the country to-day that are published in other countries at about one-half what the men who own the copyright charge.

I said awhile ago, among other things, that there was a combination working up this measure, and that is the most objectionable feature of this bill to my mind. The first thing that impressed me in reading over the testimony, after Mr. Eggleston had made his statement, was a very intelligent statement made by Mr. Welsh, of Philadelphia. He appeared for the type-setters during the last Congress in opposition to the Hawley bill. Now, when they had things arranged in this bill offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, so that they could charge what they pleased, both he and Mr. SHERMAN came before the committee and said they were content with this scheme. They had been very bitterly opposed to the other bill, because it did not provide to have the printing done in this country and the type set here, so that they could make their share of the money.

Mr. Welsh went on to show that with the 25 per cent. duty publishers in England would bring over their own stereotype plates; they could make them so light, and they could produce those books so cheaply that printers here could not compete with them; and he gives a short explanation of the difference, which would be from $60 to $361 in cost of type and material that they would have to use. His statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF JAMES WELSH.

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I represent Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2. When I appeared before this body two years ago I had a very large correspondence with the whole typographical profession of our country, and all of them indorsed the Chace bill; and the opportunity of meditation which the lapse of time has given since has but served to render this indorsement more emphatic, especially in view of the amendment requiring that the type-setting shall be done in this country. This, with the other provisions of the bill, will render it satisfactory to all the labor interests concerned in the production of books.

The principle of protection is recognized and enforced in many foreign countries. Some two years ago, when I was president of the Philadelphia Typographical Union, a gentleman went to France to put up a press. He was required in the first place to pay $15,000 before setting up a press in that country, and everything pertaining to it had to be manufactured there.

I have been authorized by our union to come before you gentlemen and submit the following statement:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"In the two years that have gone by since a delegation from the printers' unions were before the Senate Committee on Patents, we are glad to see that all parties interested in the preparation and manufacture of books have come into accord on this matter of international copyright.

"To effect harmony in so widespread an industry concessions have been made by all for a common good. The three amendments to the bill as originally introduced by Senator CHACE, necessary to harmonize all interests, being—

"First. Requiring simultaneous publication.

"Second. Admitting not more than two copies in any one invoice of a copyrighted book, for use but not for sale.

"Third. Requiring type-setting to be done in this country.

"The bill thus amended has been approved at a meeting of Typographical Union No. 2, and the following resolutions passed:

"'Resolved, That Typographical Union No. 2 hereby expresses its satisfaction with the Chace bill as above amended, and asks for it the favorable consideration of the Senators and Representatives from Pennsylvania and Philadelphia.

"'Resolved, That the typographical unions throughout the country are respectfully requested to take appropriate action in a matter so important to the welfare of our fraternity and the many business interests incident to it, and to correspond with their Senators and Representatives urging them to facilitate its passage.

"'Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed, whose duty it shall be to take such action as may be advisable to carry into effect the above resolutions.'

"In conclusion, we would wish to say that when the bill was before the Committee on Patents, Union No. 2 obtained the indorsement for it of united labor throughout the United States.

"In its present shape it is more than ever acceptable to this great labor interest, and we promise that this bill shall have the support not only of every printers' union but also of every labor union in the land.

"By order of Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2.

"JAMES WELSH.

"Chairman Committee on International Copyright."

The object of the bill is one that interests a vast multitude of persons connected with our business. As it pertains especially to the typographical fraternity, everything incident to it is alive with interest for us. We desire most earnestly that this bill shall receive your approval and that it shall have its final passage through both Houses.

I thank you, gentleman, for your attention.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Welsh is a gentleman who felt bound in the interests of his colleagues a few years ago to fight the bill as introduced by Senator HAWLEY. He is earnestly for international copyright with the protective features of the Chace bill.

Mr. Putnam, of the house of Putnam's Sons, of New York, makes this statement:

Mr. PUTNAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am a publisher and am secretary of the American Publishers' Copyright League. This association now includes, with hardly an exception, all the publishers in the country, representing all classes of publishing interests; publishers who have extensive book-manufacturing interests, and who are the printers of their own books, and publishers who have no manufacturing interests, but who make their profits purely out of the sale of books. It includes also representatives of the great music houses, and it also includes, I am glad to add, three firms which during the past ten years have devoted their business almost exclusively to what are known as reprints—Messrs. George Munro, John W. Lovell, and J. B. Alden.

The publishers of the country came together in this copyright league at the suggestion and instance of the authors, and during the past two months the executive committee of the Authors and Publishers' League have been working together in conference for the purpose of putting into shape a copyright measure which could secure the support of both associations. The bill that Senator CHACE has now before your committee is the bill which is supported by these national associations of authors and publishers, as well as by the typographical unions, from whose representatives you have heard.

Mr. Cummin went on to show that of all the books which were published in this country 85 per cent. (outside of the Government Printing Office) were published in four cities, New York, Boston, Cambridge, and Philadelphia; that there was not 5 per cent. of the book printing done outside of these places. When the matter was up the year before Mr. Welsh, as I said, opposed the Hawley bill, but he now says that—

We are content; if this bill passes we will have type-setting; we will have the printing of every book which is published before it can enter this country, everything else being excluded; and we can get our prices; we could not get it otherwise, and 95 per cent. of the books that come from abroad are published in those four cities; they have formed their union whereby they can charge what they please.

The result, therefore, is that the American people are no longer to have the benefit of getting cheap books, because this union of purchasers of foreign copyrights, publishers and printers, will force every foreign book that is published to be published by them and at their prices until magazines and books of value will be sold at just such a price as they see fit to ask. That is the object of this combination; it is confessed all through the testimony given before the committee by the promoters of this scheme.

When the Hawley bill was up the type-setters raised a cry against it and killed it. I believe it was never brought before the Senate for discussion.

Beginning on page 44 of report No. 1188, first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, is the statement of Mr. Welsh, of Philadelphia, representing the Typographical Union, in which he denounced the Hawley bill and every measure that was calculated to allow cheap books to come in, or to do anything to promote either art or science among the American people unless the type-setters could get their share of it. There are four or five pages of telegrams. The following give an idea of the whole:

FALL RIVER TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 161.

FALL RIVER, MASS., January 11, 1886.

The newspapers and job printers of this city do sternly protest against the passage of Senator HAWLEY's international copyright bill, and will do all in their power to kill it.

WILLIAM B. WALSH,
Secretary Typographical Union No. 161.

PORTLAND TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 66.

PORTLAND, ME., January 19, 1886.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this union that unjust discrimination towards our craft is shown in Senator HAWLEY's proposed amendments to the copyright laws, and that this union is opposed to the same.

Resolved, That the bill as prepared by Typographical Union No. 2 is hereby indorsed by this union.

Corresponding Secretary.

NORWICH TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 100.

NORWICH, CONN., January 16, 1886.

Resolved, That Norwich Typographical Union No. 100, hereby protests against the passage of any bill by Congress giving to foreign books and publications the benefits of our copyright laws which does not provide, in terms or effect, that all such books and publications intended for circulation in this country shall be printed and manufactured in the United States.

WILLIAM N. ANDREW, President.

HARTFORD TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 127.

HARTFORD, CONN., January 11, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In response to a letter addressed to him, Senator HAWLEY sent me a copy of his proposed bill and a letter of which the following is a copy:

"UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER, Washington, January 1, 1886.

"DEAR SIR: I inclose you a copy of the international copyright bill which I introduced here, at the request of the Association of Authors. Last week I attended a gathering of sixteen gentlemen in New York City—authors and publishers—at which they endeavored, and I think succeeded, in harmonizing their desires; the publishers, naturally and properly enough, wishing to protect the manufacture of books in this country. I think there will be a clause added to the bill providing that whatever copyrights foreign authors acquire here shall take with them the necessity of having the composition, paper, presswork, binding, etc., in fact all the work of publication, done in the United States.

"They will probably reserve the right to purchase a copy of the foreign edition of the work, just as we may do now, under qualifications. Some people always desire a copy of an original edition, even if it costs them ten times as much.

"Yours, truly,

"JOSEPH R. HAWLEY."

Fraternally, yours,

F. M. GRAHAM, Secretary No. 127.

Mr. JAMES WELSH,
President Typographical Union No. 2.

TROY TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 52.

TROY, N. Y., January 19, 1886.

Whereas an international copyright bill (known as Senate bill 191) has been introduced in the Federal Senate by the Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY; and

Whereas if said bill, in its present form, becomes law, it will prove detrimental to a large body of American citizens employed at the several branches of the printing trade, allowing foreigners the right of copyright here, but not compelling them to have their works printed in the United States;

Resolved, That we, printers of the city of Troy, N. Y., do hereby emphatically protest against the passage of Senator HAWLEY's bill, and we earnestly appeal to the United States Senators from this commonwealth, and to the Representatives in Congress from this district, to use their influence and votes to defeat the objectionable measure.

Resolved, That we favor the enactment of an international copyright law that, while it shall give to foreign authors the privileges that are enjoyed by writers in this Republic, said foreigners, in order to derive the benefits from copyright in the United States, shall be required to have the mechanical portions of their productions performed in this country.

Copies of the resolutions were ordered sent to Warner Miller and William M. Evarts, Senators, and Congressman Burleigh.

This afternoon, in the State Workingmen's Assembly, in session at Albany, a resolution was offered by Mr. Philip Scannell, of No. 6, of New York City, protesting against the Hawley bill. The resolution was referred to the committee on resolutions. It will be adopted to-morrow, and copies sent to the two Senators and every Congressman from this State.

Fraternally,

GEORGE A. STEVENS, President.

As Mr. Welsh explained, the present measure is the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island. It is indorsed by the combination because it is certain to double and quadruple the cost of printing foreign books by transferring, as they claim, the difference between $60 and $361.50, in the cost of type used, all of which they claim they will get by this combination of the book publishers in the four great cities of the Union to the exclusion of everybody else.

Mr. CHACE. As the Senator seems to be addressing me——

Mr. BECK. No; I said the present measure was the bill prepared by you or for you.

Mr. CHACE. Would the Senator prefer that this type-setting should be done abroad rather than in this country?

Mr. BECK. I am opposed under the guise of promoting science and the useful arts to establishing a monopoly under false pretenses when protection is the object aimed at. The Senator from Rhode Island announced to me the other day, when he opened this debate, that for once he and I could agree; that there was no protection in this bill; that it was free from all that jobbery. On the contrary, it is the worst job that I ever saw. No tariff protectionist has ever dared to say that under the limited right to promote science and the useful arts you would, under the guise of giving to a foreign author rights to bring his books here, deprive the American people of the right to reasonably cheap books, and call them pirates and thieves if they did not submit to have the book printed here at four and five times the cost that they could have it done elsewhere when the avowed object was to promote science and art.

The real object of this scheme is to build up a monopoly. The object is to get a few men in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia to publish all the foreign books to the absolute exclusion of everybody else, at whatever cost they may see fit, and then to sell them to 60,000,000 American people, whose interest they pretend that they are working for. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question, if he will allow me to do so?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I sympathize with all that the Senator has said upon this question of the absolute prohibition of the importation of books to this country. I suggested the same difficulty when this bill was under consideration before. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky if his objections to the bill would not be met by striking out all of section 2 as printed on page 4 of the bill?

Mr. BECK. That section covers the very serious objection I have to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I very strongly favor the passage of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I am very much in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. Is that embraced in the part the Senator proposes to strike out?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I do not know to what the Senator alludes.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Missouri offered an amendment just now, but I do not think it comes in on that page.

Mr. VEST. It is on page 3.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I was out of the Chamber at the time it was offered.

Mr. BECK. In line 19, on page 3, the Senator from Missouri moved to strike out the words "from type set within the limits of the United States." That I am very much in favor of.

Mr. CHACE. Does the Senator from Arkansas propose to strike out all of section 2 on page 3?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. No; all that part of section 2 that is on page 4. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky, if they will permit me just here to make a suggestion, that perhaps the phrase "from type set within the limits of the United States" is not so objectionable after all as it might appear at first. The words "from type set within the limits of the United States" only apply to the right of copyrighting. That is to say, a foreign author can not get a copyright for a book that he proposes to file with the Librarian here unless it comes from type printed within the United States. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to that feature remaining in the bill, so that when a foreign author comes here to ask for a copyright that he files, if he gets a copyright at all it is provided that the book must be printed from type set within the United States. I have no objection to that provision.

Mr. KENNA. Let me ask a question. Suppose instead of having the type set in the United States the proprietor should bring a copy of a book printed from type set in a foreign country and have that copy produced by some other method, say by photolithographing, would that section exclude him from a copyright if he should resort to that process here?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It would exclude him absolutely unless the book was printed from type set in the United States, and as far as I am concerned I have no objection to those words remaining in the bill. The features of the bill to which I object, and the features which I think are liable to the criticism of the Senator from Kentucky, are all embraced in that part of section 2 which is found printed on page 4 of the bill. I propose at the proper time to move to strike out that part of the bill, and if that is stricken out I should very earnestly support the measure.

Mr. VEST. What does the Senator from Arkansas propose to strike out?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. All of section 2 as printed in the bill, beginning at the top of page 4, as follows:

During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book or other article so copyrighted shall be, and it hereby is, prohibited, except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation. All officers of customs and postmasters are hereby required to seize and destroy all copies of such prohibited articles as shall be entered at the custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States, or transmitted to the mails of the United States. In case of books in foreign languages, of which only translations in English are copyrighted, the prohibition of importation shall apply only to the translation of the same, and the importation of the books in the original language shall be permitted.

That is the language I propose to strike out of the bill; and it seems to me that it removes every objection which has been made by the Senator from Kentucky. I heartily agree with him that those features of the bill are exceedingly objectionable; and with those features out of the bill it seems to me it is a proper thing that the bill should be passed, and that we are only doing what is right and fair towards foreign authors in enacting it into a law.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Arkansas is a member of the committee, and knows a great deal more about the measure than I do. I only make the remarks I am now making, in a very disjointed way, because I do not like many things in the bill. Let me ask the Senator from Arkansas what sort of use would the right to bring in two copies for private use be to men in this country if they had to obtain the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright? What induced the committee to insert that provision in the bill?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. That feature would be stricken out if my amendment were adopted. That feature goes out with the others.

Mr. BECK. Then let me ask another question. I am seeking information. It is now known that England does not allow us anything like the right we propose to give to English authors. We can not have a copyright in England unless a man is a resident there during at least a part of the time of publication. Take General Grant's Notes, for instance, a book written by him when he was ill and could not be removed to English soil even temporarily. Why should we give those people rights that they do not propose to give to us? Germany does not do it; Russia does not do it. Why is there not some such provision as this, which was contained in the Hawley bill which was before the committee last year?

That the citizens of foreign states and countries of which the law, treaties, or conventions confer, or shall hereafter confer, upon citizens of the United States rights of copyright equal to those accorded to their own citizens, etc.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am willing to vote for such a provision, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. BECK. That is one of the reasons why I objected to this bill. It is because all bills looking to legitimate copyright seem to have been lost sight of in the determination to make monopolies and to make every book dear to the people of the United States; not to aid in getting their books cheaper, not to aid foreign authors, not to do anything except to bring everything into the hands of a combination or a pool of publishers in two or three big cities of the Union backed by the men who opposed the fair bill introduced last year by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] because they would not make any money out of it.

But they combined and determined that they would publish only what they pleased and how they pleased and at such prices as they pleased, and load the American people down with extravagant prices for those works and it was only in that way they could get up anything that they thought they could pass at all, as the telegrams which I read show.

When the Senator from Rhode Island rose to ask me a question I was speaking of it as though it was his bill. Mr. Welsh, in this same statement told why they oppose the Hawley bill and the bill introduced by Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, as destructive of the interests of those who earned their bread in these trades. He said:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The printers of the United States, the type-founders, the stereotypers, the electrotypers, the paper-makers, the book-binders, and many other branches of American industry connected with or dependent on printing, earnestly and respectfully protest against Senate bill 191, introduced by Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, and its counterpart introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. J. Randolph Tucker, regarding them as destructive of the interests of all who earn their bread in these various trades.

As the copyright on a book absolutely prevents any one from printing it except the proprietor, we consider it a matter of vital importance that your honorable bodies shall so frame any legislation creating international copyright as to secure that such proprietor shall not be a foreign manufacturer with an agent in New York.

To effect this it is not sufficient to insert a clause that the manufacturing shall be done in this country, as this could easily be evaded.

Nothing short of total exclusion of all copyrighted books (which we understand is law in other countries) will secure the interests of the crafts which we represent. Any permission to import copies because some people want foreign editions, and think American copies not good enough for them, will open a door which can not be closed, and will enable the agent of the foreign publisher to bring in, by successive shipments, all that he wants. If there are enough people fond of fine editions to make it worth while, we will print special editions for them, which American printers can do as handsomely as any in the world.

If the authors of America and England want a change we are quite willing that they should have it, and that they should be able to obtain the highest rewards for their labor so long as they do not interfere with and jeopardize the rewards for our labor, and deprive us of the means of maintaining our homes and securing the happiness of those dependent on us. With this object we have drawn up a bill which we believe will give them all they want, while it will not hurt our industries. It has been introduced by Senator CHACE, and we respectfully ask of you its favorable consideration.

We append a brief report of the action of such typographical unions as have thus far been heard from. The time has been too short for more than incomplete advices to reach us, and we are receiving additional ones every day, but these will serve to show that the feeling of hostility to Senator HAWLEY's bill is not restricted to a few places, but spreads over the whole country.

On the other hand, the bill just introduced by Senator CHACE meets with the unanimous approval of all those unions which have had time to act upon it.

In conclusion, we have received assurances from the great labor organizations of the United States that they will make our cause their own, by using their influence to secure the defeat of Senator HAWLEY's bill and the passsage of that introduced by Senator CHACE.

We hope that in your wisdom you will recognize the justice of our petition.

By order of Typographical Union No. 2.

JAMES WELSH,
President.

They thereby append a number of telegrams protesting against the Hawley bill and all propositions simply giving to foreign authors the right to have a decent compensation, and protesting against everything unless all the typesetting is put in their hands, and the foreign copyright books go into the hands of a combination of publishers so that they could publish the books at as high a price as they please. I confessed the other day——

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, rose.

Mr. BECK. I am done.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I was going to respond to the point just made by the Senator from Kentucky. I have no speech to make. I am assured that the very same rights would be accorded to our people abroad which are to be accorded to foreign authors here in case this bill is passed. It seems that they have been ahead of us in liberal treatment of our authors; that they have done more for our people than we have done for theirs, and they stand ready to meet us in a fair reciprocal arrangement to be made for the authors of different nations. I have no doubt, as far as I am concerned, that that would be the case. At least we are assured that that is the fact.

Mr. BECK. They have not done it, so far as I am able to observe.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. They have already done more for our authors than we have done for theirs. They have exceeded us always in privileges in regard to the rights of foreign authors.

Mr. BECK. The list of books and prices furnished by the Senate committee in 1873, of American works, would indicate that they were about the same. There is no legislation that has given us any right to pass such a measure; and what I objected to was the arrogant way in which people have formed their combinations, the printers, the publishers, and authors who come before us, and speak about the Congress of the United States as though we were all a set of thieves. Take the most distinguished man, perhaps, among them, Hon. James Russell Lowell. Let me read just one sentence from what he said, and then I am done:

I, myself—

Said Mr. Lowell—

I, myself, take the moral view of the question. I believe that this is a simple question of morality and justice; that many of the arguments which Mr. Hubbard used are arguments which might be used for picking a man's pocket. One could live a great deal cheaper, undoubtedly, if he could supply himself from other people without any labor or cost. But at the same time—well, it was not called honest when I was young, and that is all I can say.

I can not help thinking that a book which was, I believe, more read when I was young than it is now, is quite right when it says that "Righteousness exalteth a nation." I believe this is a question of righteousness. I do not wish to urge that too far, because that is considered a little too ideal, I believe. But that is my view of it, and if I were asked what book is better than a cheap book, I should answer that there is one book better than a cheap book, and that is a book honestly come by. That would be my feeling.

It will not do for anybody to come before the Congress of the United States, distinguished as he may be, in order to put money in his own pocket, and to call the framers of the Constitution thieves, the men robbers who passed the laws limiting copyright to fourteen years and then extending it to twenty-eight, because, in Mr. Lowell's opinion, it is as much robbery to take away his property if he has a right to it one day after fourteen years as it is one day after publication. I say I resent in my own name, and in the name of the people I represent, all such aspersions as he and other interested claimants have the impudence to make.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. A criticism, to be effective, ought always to be fair. I do not think that anybody is liable to the criticism that the Senator from Kentucky has just now made. It seems to me that these epithets of piracy, etc., which have been disclaimed until recently and have been laid aside and tabooed, were not indulged in. As far as I know they have not been applied, and should not be, except to men who have taken the products of mental labor and have undertaken to make money out of them by publishing them in the United States.

There is no attempt on the part of these authors to charge members of Congress and men opposed to the passage of a copyright law or anybody on this side who bought his books with the epithet of pirate or piracy. It has been applied to men who have undertaken to take advantage of that sort of thing and to utilize the labor of other people for the purpose of making money for themselves, and I do not think Mr. Lowell ought to be charged with having used such epithets towards members of the Senate of the United States or members of the House of Representatives when such is not the fact. It was never so understood, I believe, by anybody.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it, because the language used would indicate differently.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Kentucky misconstrued those quotations. They were applied simply and solely to publishers who have undertaken to publish the products of the brains of other people without any compensation to them whatever. I submit that it is not fair, because the labor of a man's brains is as much his property if in the form of a book as if it takes the shape of an invention, or it is as much his property as is the result of the labor of his hands.

I have no more right to appropriate the labor of a man's brains than I have to appropriate anything that may result from his handiwork. I do not believe it is fair; and if I were called on to state clearly and distinctly whether I believe it honest or not, I should be compelled to say that I believe it is absolutely dishonest for a man simply to take advantage of the law of the land, or the fact that there was no law, by utilizing those products of the brain to his own use, and making money out of them.

Mr. BECK. One word more. This bill, it appears from their statements, was written by that body of very potent men known as the typographical union. They changed the whole phase of the original proposition, and a bill has been brought in here because they threatened to defeat all others, the provisions of which were never before contemplated, and as to which even members of the committee do not agree. But independent of all this, I think there are very many reasons why foreign authors should not be placed by law upon the same footing with our own. For example, under the copyright law as it now exists twenty-eight years is the limit. Then section 4954 of the Revised Statutes provides thus:

SEC. 4954. The author, inventor, or designer, if he be still living and a citizen of the United States or resident therein, or his widow or children if he be dead, shall have the same exclusive right continued for the further term of fourteen years, upon recording the title of the work or description of the article so secured a second time, and complying with all other regulations in regard to original copyrights, within six months before the expiration of the first term.

As I read from the Constitution a little while ago, Congress was given the power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." Congress saw fit first in 1790 to give a right for fourteen years, then in 1831 to give twenty-eight years, with the exclusive right to the author or inventor, or his widow or children, if he be dead, for fourteen years longer.

That was designed to protect an American author and to protect his wife and his children beyond the term of twenty-eight years. Are we under any obligation to protect the wives and children of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, or Russians? If the author died in America, leaving no wife and no children, his assignees would not get the extension of fourteen years beyond the twenty-eight years; the right is limited, if he is dead, to his widow or his children. The English author might be a bachelor; the Frenchman or the Russian author might have neither wife nor children, and if he had, why should we be protecting them beyond the original grant of twenty-eight years?

I mention this to show that, in carrying out the provision of the Constitution, the American Congress had regard for the widow and the children of the American inventor and author, and it does not at all apply to a foreign author, because if the American had neither wife nor children the time expired in twenty-eight years. As I read this provision, the executors of an author who leaves no family can not get the extension; his assignees can not extend it; the extension of fourteen years is allowed for the benefit of his widow and children, and the public have a right to it at the end of the original term if he dies without a widow or children, unless I am wrong in my construction, and I should like some of the lawyers who have looked at the law more carefully than I have been able to look at it, to tell me if I am not right in that construction; and if I am, then twenty-eight years ought to be the absolute limit of copyright to any foreigner, no matter whether he is a married man or a single man, and the fourteen years' extension given to our own authors, if they die leaving a widow and children, being simply a legislative provision for the benefit of the widow and children, and not for the benefit of anybody else, it ought not to be extended to foreign authors; the pending bill is not right in that regard. The reading public should have the monopoly removed at the end of the original term. While a great deal can be said and a great deal has been said in favor of giving authors the benefit of the product of their brains, and much eloquence has been expended to show that it is wrong to deprive them of it, there have been very distinguished men in England, as I see by the statements in this report, who have opposed it even in England. I saw something copied the other day from a very celebrated English author who opposed it. Mr. Gardiner G. Hubbard, while before the Senate committee in opposition to this bill, among other things, said:

I said that England in its law of copyright did not recognize any natural right of the author, or any right of property in the author, but only passed such laws in regard to copyright as were for the interest of the people. Similar arguments and almost the same language that have been used in this hearing were used by Mr. Carlyle and Thomas Hood in the discussion before Parliament in 1841 and 1842 of the measure introduced by Sergeant Talfourd.

They were opposed by Hume, Grote, and the philosophical radicals on the ground that any extension of copyright must enhance the price of books, and by Lord Macaulay, who argued that there was no natural right of property and that copyright was a monopoly, making books dear, and as such only to be justified within certain limits by expediency. Copyright he defined as "a tax on readers for the purpose of giving a bounty to writers."

And we may add in this bill to publishers and type-setters three times, perhaps, the monopoly which will be given to the author.

The question of international copyright was subsequently tried before the House of Lords, which decided that—

"Copyright is altogether an artificial right, not naturally and necessarily arising out of the social rules that ought to prevail among mankind, but is a creature of municipal laws of each country."

Now, Mr. President, I have said a good deal more than I expected to say about this bill. Even if I was willing to do something in the general direction, I should like to see the measure divested of many of the features of monopoly which I think have been brought into it in violation of the principles that ought to be regarded in an international copyright law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to argue this question at all, but I do not like the category in which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has placed all of us who have indicated a disposition to support the principle of this bill. In what I said the other day I only stated the principle on which the bill is based. As to its details I recognize the objections of the Senator from Kentucky and I have made a motion to strike out the second section. What I said then, however, I repeat to-day as to the general principle of an international copyright law.

I never will admit that the Congress of the United States should refuse to a foreign author the privilege or the right of property in his own intellectual production; and whenever the Senator from Kentucky carries his argument to its legitimate extent he attacks the copyright law in the United States and in every other civilized country in the world.

Mr. President, as a Democrat, Jefferson is considered good authority for granting a copyright law. In the fifth volume of his works he says, in writing to Oliver Evans in regard to this question:

Certainly an inventor ought to be allowed a right to the benefit of his invention for some certain time. It is equally certain it ought not to be perpetual; for to embarrass society with monopolies for every utensil existing, and in all the details of life, would be more injurious to them than had the supposed inventors never existed; because the natural understanding of its members would have suggested the same things or others as good. How long the term should be is the difficult question. Our legislators have copied the English estimate of the term, perhaps without sufficiently considering how much longer, in a country so much more sparsely settled, it takes for an invention to become known, and used to an extent profitable to the inventor. Nobody wishes more than I do that ingenuity should receive a liberal encouragement; nobody estimates higher the utility which society has derived from that displayed by yourself.—Jefferson's Works, volume 5, page 75.

The principle of copyright is too well established in the civilized world to be overthrown to-day. The framers of the Constitution intended in the provision which the Senator from Kentucky has read to simply assert that in the interest of science and literature and intellectual invention the copyright law should be established by Congress, as has been done.

Mr. President, I have never asked and never advocated any other principle than the International Copyright Union, and I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky, when he makes the statement that the United States does not stand alone in regard to this question, to that International Copyright Union itself. One of its provisions is this:

Authors within the jurisdiction of one of the countries of the union, or their heirs, shall enjoy in the other countries, for their works, whether they are or are not published in one of these countries, the rights which the respective laws of those countries now accord or shall subsequently accord to their own countrymen.

The countries that entered into this union are Germany, Belgium, Spain, France, Great Britain, Hayti, Italy, Liberia, Switzerland, and Tunis.

President Cleveland in referring to the International Copyright Union in his annual message, December 6, 1886, said:

Inasmuch as the Constitution gives to Congress the power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," this Government did not feel warranted in becoming a signatory pending the action of Congress upon measures of international copyright now before it, but the right of adhesion to the Berne convention hereafter, has been reserved. I trust the subject will receive at your hands the attention it deserves, and that the just claims of authors, so urgently pressed, will be duly heeded.

That is all that any friend of literature demands, that the people of this country shall simply give to the authors of another country the protection that they give to our authors, that there shall be in the commonwealth of letters no geographical distinction. That is all.

All that the Senator has said with regard to trusts and monopolies, I thoroughly agree with. I do not know a single publisher in the United States that I have been approached by but one, and that was in opposition to this bill. The pamphlet which I hold in my hand has been distributed, I take it, from most patriotic and disinterested motives, and every Senator present has a copy of it. I would ask the Senator from Kentucky if he ever heard anything anywhere that excels this argument in favor of protection.

That in point of numbers, also, the advantage would be against the American author. The foreign authors, whose works could be copyrighted in this country, and who would then be able to transfer the exclusive right to American publishers, would outnumber the American authors ten to one, and the American author would be brought right face to face with ten foreign authors that he now does not have to compete with.

If that is not monopoly and protection run mad, I do not understand the English language. This is a pamphlet handed me by an agent of American publishers entitled "Some reasons why Senate bill No. 554 (providing for international copyright) should not become part of the Revised Statutes of the United States"—this bill we are now considering—

It is only the American author who can now go to our publishers and say "I can give you the sole right in the United States."

They have got the monopoly, says this pamphlet—

If, however, this bill becomes a law, all the foreign authors of England, Germany, France, and other countries would be enabled to give the same exclusive rights as the American author now does. The American author would be confronted by so great an array of foreign authors as to almost, if not quite, appall and discourage him from further effort in the line of authorship. Publishers could buy the fruits of literary work cheaper in foreign markets than at home, and the tendency would be to lower the price for American authorship, consequently to deteriorate the quality of such work.

That is protection run mad. Here are the Senator from Kentucky and myself agreed that the argument that protection which excludes foreign articles from the market of this country is logically wrong and defective; and yet on this bill he is about to adopt that identical argument, and this pamphlet that is here now in the interest of protection and monopoly for the American authors who take books which they have no right under heaven to appropriate and sell them and put the money in their own pockets so proclaims. There can be no worse thing than this and nothing more dishonest. If you strike down this bill, or the principle of it—I say nothing of the details—you strike down the principle which underlies all right of property, that of creation, whether it be intellectual or manual. That is all I propose to say about it.

Mr. BECK. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I have read no pamphlet since the report of the committee. I received a letter this morning containing a newspaper slip, and a friend handed me a newspaper awhile ago and I looked at it without reading it over. All I know is what I have seen in the report. As to the laws to which I have referred as to Great Britain, France, and Germany, I take them from the report of the committee and from the statement of R. R. Bowker, of New York, who seems to be an intelligent man, and who says:

The English copyright laws are quite similar to our own. The copyright for a book endures for forty-two years from the date of publication, or for the author's life, and for seven years after death, whichever of the two terms may be the longer.

Aliens may claim a copyright if they are within the British dominions at the time of publication; and, by a late act of Parliament, the Queen is empowered to direct by an order in council that foreign authors shall be entitled to English copyrights, where the country of which the foreign author is a citizen has granted reciprocal rights. The present state of the British law is such that it is difficult to ascertain the rights of foreign authors in that country. The British courts have never been favorable to the claims of foreign authors, so that there is a general unwillingness among Americans to apply for English copyrights.

France, with characteristic liberality, gives foreigners and natives the same copyright privileges. The term of copyright is for the life of the author and for fifty years afterwards. Copyright property is protected by stringent provisions of the statutory law of France.

Literary and dramatic copyright in the German Empire rests on an elaborate statute, which went into effect June 11, 1870. The term is for the life of the author and for thirty years after his death. Works by foreign authors are protected in Germany when published by a firm having its place of business within the German Empire.

Italy grants copyrights for eighty years, or for the life of the author, and for forty years after his death, whichever may be the longer term. She also places foreigners upon precisely the same footing as natives.

In Russia a copyright lasts for the author's life and for fifty years afterward, and it would seem that foreigners resident in Russia are entitled to the same protection as natives.

And so on, giving the laws of each one. The International Copyright Union, I suppose, is that done by the parliament of each country; I do not know.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator will allow me, I will try to enlighten him in regard to that matter.

Mr. BECK. I based what I said on the report of the committee.

Mr. CHACE. That is an old hearing.

Mr. BECK. One year old.

Mr. CHACE. No.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon.

Mr. CHACE. Two years old. The governments of Great Britain, France——

Mr. BECK. The reprint is by you now as part of your report.

Mr. CHACE. It is a reprint of an old hearing.

Mr. BECK. It is a hearing at the last Congress.

Mr. CHACE. I want to inform the Senator from Kentucky that under the provisions of the International Copyright Union those governments which are members of that union accord each to the citizens of the other states the same privileges within their own domain that their own citizens acquire by law in the other.

Mr. VEST. I read it.

Mr. CHACE. That fact simply disposes of the statement of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. VEST. But the section that I read includes Germany, Great Britain, and France, and they give under the terms of that International Copyright Union the same rights to the authors of those countries that they accord to their own principle. That is all I ask now. I say it is a right one and a just one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this is a very important question, and deserves careful consideration. The question of the expediency of giving a man an exclusive right for a limited time in his writings is one in regard to which I presume there would be very little difference of opinion. Certainly it is the creature of municipal law entirely, and the only question that can properly be considered in regard to it is how far it promotes the general welfare and progress of the people. A right of property in external things has been from the foundation of the law regarded as a proper institution of society and government; but the right of property in a man's thoughts is an altogether metaphysical right, an intangible right.

There can be no monopoly upon thought, and the Constitution happily expresses it by saying that Congress shall have power for a limited time to give to authors the exclusive right to their writings, the thought embodied in writing books, a subject of property according to the law that Congress in its discretion may pass—not because of the author, but for the promotion of science and the arts. In this discussion it has been asserted time and again that the man himself had a right superior to all others, but that is not the philosophy of life. A man lives not for himself alone; he could not live for himself; and what he derives as his own in all the higher views of life must be to enable him to make his contribution to the work of his kind and of his age, to the work of the improvement of mankind, of the progress of mankind.

No system of law has ever been predicated upon the idea that a man lives for himself alone, and that his rights are to be regulated from an entirely selfish point of view. Thus Blackstone in his commentaries upon the law has said what perhaps can not be so well said by any one else:

In the beginning of the world, we are informed by Holy Writ, the all-bountiful Creator gave to man "dominion over all the earth, and over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." This is the only true and solid foundation of man's dominion over external things, whatever airy metaphysical notions may have been started by fanciful writers upon this subject. The earth, therefore, and all things therein, are the general property of all mankind.

It was therefore external things that a man had a right of property in. As civilization advanced the embodied or written thought became in the interest of mankind a right of property for a limited time in order that the progress of science might be promoted, not for the benefit of the man, but for the higher benefit of the promotion of science and the useful arts for all mankind.

Mr. President, that is one idea. Is that the idea of this bill, the promotion of science and the useful arts? This bill contains several features: one is the copyright for a limited time to the author of a writing; the other is a condition upon which that right shall be conferred. It is not a recognition, as has been said here in the argument, of the right of the author to the creation of his brain, but it is a recognition of the right to the exclusive property in it for a limited time upon condition; and what condition? Upon the condition that he shall reprint, republish this product of his brain, in the limits of another country in order that right of property may be recognized there, that he shall give employment to the artisans, the capital, the material of another country. These two ideas are entirely distinct, and if beneficial they must stand upon separate and distinct grounds.

It will not do to confuse these two propositions together. One is of one character, for the promotion of science and the useful arts, the other for the promotion of the material welfare and prosperity of the people. The one by this bill is made conditioned upon the other. There is and can be no connection between these two things. This bill declares that a foreign author shall not have a right or property in his writings in the United States unless he shall give a part of his property to the support and maintenance of the industries of the United States. It makes by law a levy of a forced contribution upon him.

Now, Mr. President, how far is it expedient that we shall limit the diffusion of thought? How far is it expedient that we shall say to the intellect of England or of Europe or of Asia or of any part of the world, "You shall not have access to the general mind of the people of the United States; it shall only be communicated if you obtain any great discoveries in science or in art to those who possess the means of purchasing whatever may be found for their own use at whatever cost?"

How far is it wise to say that we shall limit the progress of thought and discovery by excluding from the mind of our people the intellectual progress in science and in art of the people of another country, unless we can combine it with profit to our own people? That is not a wise position in which to place this question. It is thought, and cultivated thought alone, that bursts the bands of ignorance and that trains men and teaches men to pursue those higher paths of political economy, of individual attainment, of industrial success that are necessary to make a people progressive and attain the highest possible point of human excellence.

The thought of all human kind is not more than sufficient to develop continuously the highest capabilities of the race and reach the goal of the possible future of our kind. Educated thought, applied science, is the only real imperishable wealth which can be transmitted from one generation to another. Why limit it within bounds? Why say it shall not flow freely and with as little cost as may be into the minds of our people? Why say, as does this bill, that the people shall not be educated by foreign thought and foreign discoveries unless the American publisher, manufacturer, and artisan can make profit out of the education of our own people?

Therefore I consider that unless it can be demonstrated that to publish and print a book in the United States of America will make it cheaper, will render it generally accessible to the reading public, such a condition ought not to be attached to it. The best attainable thought for the least amount of labor—or of money, the representative of labor—should be, in regard to intellectual thought, the great object to be attained.

Now, what does this bill provide in that direction? A man obtains a copyright of his written thought in any foreign country. He places it in the hands of a publisher. The expense of the setting of the type, of the plates, all the great cost of the work, is incurred there. Will it cheapen it to have that book reproduced here from the beginning, the cost duplicated?

Or if the whole world were open to its sale printed from the original plates would it not diminish the cost? The international copyright law is that a copyright in one country upon the observance of certain forms becomes a copyright all over the world, including this country; would not this larger audience, this larger number of customers or purchasers make it the interest and good economy in the publisher who has once incurred the cost to put the book down to its lowest possible value? You have given a monopoly now; why not let the laws of trade apply to it and give him the largest number of customers that the reading public of the world can furnish? That is what an international copyright should mean.

But this bill is predicated upon the idea that you attach a condition to this right of ownership in this country; that the work shall be republished here, the types reset, the plates remade, the whole material of American production and American use, and the artisan to be of American character. Unless that condition is attached to it the law is made inoperative by the bill, and the right of authorship here is denied.

I take it that is the great question for consideration, and whatever may be the theory that is represented by schools of political thought in regard to the importation of foreign productions or the increased price here, whatever may be those theories in order to give better employment and better wages, there must be a limit put upon them. This should not be applied to embodied human thought, to the discoveries of abstract or practical truth.

If you wish to accomplish anything, it must be by the best ideas that the human mind can produce, and we had as well enact as this bill does in words, that however great may be the discovery in any economy of life, in any subject of thought, however elevated it may be in the production of art, however much to the advancement of mankind may be the intellectual effort elsewhere in the world, unless it can be brought here and materialized into new employment for labor and for capital, it shall be excluded from the great mass of the people of this country. That is the declaration of this bill.

My friend from Rhode Island, whose ability and disinterested advocacy of this bill I admit and appreciate, I think makes a mistake in that point of view. He believes, and there is some force in the suggestion in some directions, but not in this, that the association of effort of labor, of capital in the great publishing houses of this country, whatever it may be called, possessing gigantic resources in money and credit, is enabled to pursue cheaper economies, to buy larger quantities, to employ labor more permanently and advantageously, and in many respects to accomplish economies and reduce prices which could not be done by the individual laborer.

That is certainly true, and it may be that in this country hereafter we may see some legislation necessary to restrict these great powers of association or direct them, not in the interest of preventing their cheapening of production, but in the interest of stopping their preventing that competition in pursuits which although it may bring greater cheapness, which the subsistence of the people may demand, yet represses individual effort. Perhaps one of the best thinkers of this age is Rev. Heber Newton, of New York, a clergyman and a man of profound thought, of ceaseless activity of mental effort. He has alluded to this as the age of associated powers and associated effort, and the civilization of the country no doubt is turning in that direction. The trusts are the outcome of this thought or principle of economy.

I saw the other day in the newspapers of New York that a trust had been created and common organization of their resources and that they had agreed upon cheapening the price of papers to 3 cents. Certainly that is not an evil, but at the same time further on great evils may grow out of it.

So in reference to the great Standard Oil Company, which has cheapened the cost of oil to a great extent and has accomplished a large interest for the country in the balance of trade in the amount that we export to foreign countries. Some of the men who are connected with it are men of broad views and of great capacity and benevolence. Mr. H. M. Flagler, of New York, I think, is one of the most enlightened, sagacious, capable, and charitable men that I have ever known, but that does not prove that there may not be great incidental evils which the hand of legislation must touch even in the interest of these newly-developed powers and agencies of our new industrial life.

Legitimate as may have been in the past these great associations, reducing prices and accomplishing in some respects great public objects, still there are other points which are destructive to the public welfare, and which require the action of an enlightened legislation, not looking to their destruction but to the restraint of whatever there may be that affects injuriously the general welfare of the community and of the people.

So it is in regard to this trust for books which this bill creates. My friend from Rhode Island perhaps is right in saying that great associations of capital in the literary world in large publishing houses certainly can, if they will, produce these publications at a cheaper cost than any smaller aggregation of means, than any individual means can do. Certainly the risk of having others take a book which is not copyrighted, and when they have published an edition at great cost have another one placed before the public of less value, substituting the inferior publication for the superior one, deters associated capital from engaging in publication.

But it will not do to seek to vindicate it by the assertion that a cheaper book can be produced. It is manifest that if a man copyrights in America, and any of these great publishing houses shall purchase his work, become the assignee under the law, set the type, make the plates, employ the labor, purchase the material, they could furnish that book to the public at a smaller cost than it could be done by duplicating the labor and all the cost of setting the types again and making new plates.

My friend referred to the fact that in this debate it has been alleged that the American book was cheaper than the English book. Notwithstanding labor was dearer, notwithstanding there are many elements of cost here greater than in England, still the published copyright book in America is vastly cheaper in the proportion of from one-third to one-half, and sometimes more, than the English book. Why? Because it has a larger circulation, because it is open to the sixty-odd million of American people who are readers, and therefore the cost of the book is distributed amongst so many more copies than in England.

But suppose the international copyright, pure and simple, prevailed and it was open to all the world, then the same reasons would of necessity reduce the cost just in proportion as the larger audience of the world was brought in.

Therefore, Mr. President, I appreciate the effort of the Senator from Rhode Island in seeking to give to authors the exclusive right for a limited time to their writings, and think that a consideration paramount to all others, because unless a man has the prospect of compensation for a great public work, however disinterested may be his purpose, however full of generous philanthropy he may be, it is essential that he shall have the stimulus of reward in those things which are necessary for himself and family. The comforts of life, the elegancies of life, the luxuries of life, for him and those who are dependent upon him are certainly, except in a few instances, necessary to the author. Therefore, I say, a paramount consideration for the progress of science is that the inventor shall have for a limited time the exclusive use of his writings.

Mr. President, while that is so, how careful must we be lest we mingle this question of the progress of science, of the progress of mankind, of the progress of thought, and the just compensation of the writer, the author, for his work—if we mingle it with the question of political economy of any kind within our great country. I appreciate the difficulties of formulating a law, but I do not think the features of this bill should subordinate the right of the author to that of the publisher, to that of the artist, to that of the artisan who sets the type.

I will not occupy a great deal of the time of the Senate; but what is the state of the law? It has been alluded to.

According to the English law authors enjoy a copyright for a term of forty-two years from the date of publication of the work, or during the life of the author and seven years from the date of his death, whichever may be the longer.

* * * * * * *

The Swiss grant copyright during the life of the author or to his heirs during thirty years from the date of publication of his work.

* * * * * * *

In the United States copyright is accorded to authors during twenty-eight years from the time when the title is recorded and for fourteen years more if the author or certain representatives of the author be living.

* * * * * * *

In Japan the ordinary copyright is accorded for 30 years, but the judicious Japanese consent to add fifteen years to that period in favor of works of great utility.

* * * * * * *

In Brazil the author enjoys a copyright for life, and it is extended for ten years after his death.

In Venezuela the copyright endures for the life of the author and fourteen years after his death.

In Holland and Belgium the copyright lasts during the life of the author and during twenty years after his death.

In Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Portugal copyright endures during the life of the author and during thirty years after his death. These countries, therefore, exceed the liberality of England in this matter by twenty-three years.

The law in England as here proposed does not meet the approval of the English people, and the strictures made here have been made there in regard to it. Neither does it meet the approval of Mr. Gladstone. He says:

I am not satisfied of the necessity of tying down authors to a uniform percentage, irrespective of their standing and credit in the literary world, of the form and price of the intended edition, and especially of the character of the work, as on the one hand, intended for the general public, or as, on the other hand, a professional or literary specialty.

He is in favor of an unrestricted copyright, with no conditions attached, but limited in point of time, not perpetual, not a perpetual right of property, but directly limited by law. The principle of the International Copyright Union is this:

It contains the so-called "manufacturing" clause. This clause gives a mortgage on the property of European authors to book manufacturers in America, and, to tempt book manufacturers in England to sanction the nefarious scheme, offers them the bribe of a light mortgage on the copyrights of American authors in England. The conspirators, intent on effecting the transformation of this bill into an act of Congress, allege that only by means of it, if any copyright in the United States be allowed to foreigners, can the American people continue to have cheap books. We have shown that this allegation is untrue, and that, on the contrary, a just international copyright law will conduce to make books cheaper than they have ever been, or, in the absence of such a law, can ever be on either side of the Atlantic.

I think there is no doubt about it. I think there is no question that if you extend the reading public to the whole world, whoever obtains the copyright of a book can publish it cheaper than if it is extended to only one country; that the American author, if he has the world, can sell his book to greater advantage than if he has only an American audience.

Then the only other question in the bill is, how far it is wise to promote by legislation the power of great associations, whether publishing houses or whether engaged in any other kind of business, for that question, separate and distinct, altogether is in this bill. If it be expedient that by legislation we shall promote the building up of great combinations, whether to control publication, or railroads, or commerce, or anything else, that is one question and a distinct one.

I think the tendency has been to encourage that policy as a matter of economy; but to-day we are rather seeking to restrain within proper limits, without injury, these great associations of capital; we are seeking to give them justice and protection by law without giving them perpetuity and increase of power, but to limit and restrain them within reasonable bounds.

But this bill assumes this question and makes progress in that direction; and while I am prepared to vote for any bill that will secure international copyright with the most simple conditions and limitations that can be attached in the interest of our people, an international copyright bill, and while I might perhaps be willing to vote for it alone, as a matter of policy for this country without reference to any other, I am not prepared to vote for that feature of this bill which makes a monopoly of thought and attaches a condition to it that it shall be published in our own country and of our own material and from our own labor. However that may or may not be agitated by others, it is not right as a restriction upon thought—upon the commerce of mind with mind.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to get a vote on this bill, and I think the Senate has heard very nearly enough about it. I did intend to reply to some of the positions taken by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], but I will not occupy the time now to do it further than, on the general principle involved, to read from Woolsey's International Law, section 17, pages 31 and 32:

Among the jural principles of international law we name the obligation lying on the state to protect the individuals who compose it, not only from domestic but also from foreign aggression. This obligation emanates immediately from the prime function and end of a state, and is limited by the rightfulness of the subject's conduct in his intercourse with the stranger. * * * Inasmuch as rights and obligations are correlative, there is an obligation lying on every state to respect the rights of every other, to abstain from all injury and wrong towards it, as well as towards its subjects.

In section 15, he says, page 30:

But what are the rational and moral grounds of international law? The same in general with those on which the rights and obligations of individuals in the state, and of the single state towards the individuals of which it consists, repose. If we define jus to be the science which from the nature and destination of man determines his external relations in society, both the question, What ought to be the rights and obligations of the individual in the state? and the question, what those of a state among states ought to be? fall within this branch of science. That there are such rights and obligations of states will hardly be doubted by those who admit that these relations of natural justice exist in any case. There is the same reason why they should be applied in regulating the intercourse of states as in regulating that of individuals. There is a natural destination of, states, and a divine purpose in their existence, which make it necessary that they should have certain functions and powers of acting within a certain sphere which external force may not invade. It would be strange if the state, that power which defines rights and makes them real, which creates moral persons or associations with rights and obligations, should have no such relations of its own—should be a physical and not a moral entity. In fact, to take the opposite ground would be to maintain that there is no right and wrong in the intercourse of states, and to leave their conduct to the sway of mere convenience.

Woolsey's International Law, section 16, page 31:

But there are moral relations also which are not relations of justice, and which give rise to international morality. It may be, to say the least, that nations have duties and moral claims as well as rights and obligations. In matter of fact, some of these are generally acknowledged by nations, and have entered into the law of their intercourse, as for example the duty of comity and that of humanity. These relations were called by the older writers imperfect rights and obligations, not because the moral ground for them is incomplete, but because the right in particular cases can not be ascertained, and therefore ought not to be enforced nor the violation of right regarded as an injury.

In section 24, page 39, he says:

Comity is another duty of nations. To this source may be referred in part the privileges conceded to ambassadors, and the preference given in certain cases to foreign over domestic law by the courts of Christendom. Comity, as generally understood, is national politeness and kindness. But the term seems to embrace not only that kindness which emanates from friendly feeling, but also those tokens of respect which are due between nations on the ground of right.

A much wider sense is given to the term comity by those who embrace in it all those praiseworthy acts of one nation towards another which are not stricti iuris, that is, all that, the refusal or withholding of which, although dictated by malevolence, is not an injury, and so not a ground for war. But usages originating in comity may become rights by lapse of time.

Grotius, in his Rights of War and Peace, volume 1, section 4, on page 10, says:

* * * Right is a moral quality annexed to the person, justly entitling him to possess some particular privilege, or to perform some particular act. This right is annexed to the person, although it sometimes follows the things, as the services of lands, which are called real rights, in opposition to those merely personal. Not because these rights are not annexed to persons, but the distinction is made because they belong to the persons only who possess some particular things. * * *

In section 5, page 11, he says:

Civilians call a faculty that right which every man has to his own; * * * It likewise comprehends property which is either complete or imperfect;

* * * * * * *

Note by Barbeyrac:

By the word creditum, we are here to understand, not only the right a man hath to demand what is due to him by virtue of some contract, bargain, promise or law; but also the right we have to require satisfaction for any damage or injury received; all which is included in the idea affixed to that word by the Roman lawyers.

Demosthenes says:

That we are justly more exasperated against those who, abounding in riches, commit evil actions than against those who are impelled by want to do the same. Humane judges are always right to make allowance for necessity; but where wealth is united with injustice no pretext can be pleaded in excuse.

Blackstone, book 3, page 1, says:

Wrongs are divisible into two sorts or species—private wrongs and public wrongs. The former are an infringement or prevention of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals considered as individuals, and are therefore frequently termed civil wrongs. The latter are a breach and violation of public rights and duties which affect the whole community considered as a community, and are distinguished by the harsher appellation of crimes and misdemeanors.

Pufendorf also says in his chapter on the Rule of Moral Actions, or of Law in General. (Abridgment, volume 1, page 79, note n.):

That the law should be just; that is, agreeable to the order and nature of things; for * * * whatever is just is advantageous.

And on page 81 he says:

The natural law is that which is so exactly and invariably fitted to suit with the rational and social nature of man that human kind can not maintain an honest, peaceable fellowship without observing its maxims.

NOTE p.—The law of nature is perpetual and irrevocable. * * *

The bill simply is intended to extend the provisions of our present domestic copyright law to foreign citizens. There is no provision in this bill as applied to foreign citizens that is not already in the present domestic copyright law.

I do not see the Senator from Missouri in his seat, but I was informed by him a few moments ago that he was disposed to withdraw his amendment, that he was satisfied from the discussion, and I now ask for a vote on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "printed," at the end of line 19, in section 2, it is proposed to strike out "from type set;" so as to read:

Two copies of such copyright book or other article printed within the limits of the United States, etc.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to strike out all of that part of section 2 on page 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out from the beginning of line 22 of section 2, on page 4, to the end of the section, as follows:

During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book or other article so copyrighted shall be, and it hereby is, prohibited, except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation; And provided, That any publisher of a newspaper or magazine may, without such consent, import for his own use, but not for sale, not more than two copies of any newspaper or magazine published in a foreign country. All officers of customs and postmasters are hereby required to seize and destroy all copies of such prohibited articles as shall be entered at the custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States, or transmitted to the mails of the United States. In the case of books in foreign languages, of which only translations in English are copyrighted, the prohibition of importation shall apply only to the translation of the same, and the importation of the books in the original language shall be permitted.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wish to say that this bill is certainly liable to the objections of the Senator from Kentucky unless this amendment is adopted. There is no doubt this clause changes the tariff laws of the country if it remains in the bill. Under the present law books may be imported on paying the prescribed duty. If this section is adopted those books can not be imported at all. We propose to prohibit the importation of books which may now under the laws be imported. It seems to me we are exercising authority that we have no right to exercise, under the Constitution of the United States if we retain this section in the bill.

I hope there will be no opposition to the proposition to strike it out, because I am anxious to vote for the bill. I believe it is just and proper that the rights of foreign authors should be protected by the laws of this country, and I am unwilling to vote against giving them some sort of protection in the United States; but if it has to be done at the expense of a violation of the Constitution, if it has to be done at the expense of violating the tariff laws of the country, there is nothing for me to do except to vote against the bill, which I confess I shall do with very great reluctance but will consider myself compelled to do if this amendment shall not be adopted.

Mr. CHACE. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will excuse me, but I imagine that he, perhaps, has not considered the breadth of this proposed amendment and its effect. It should be remembered that this bill is simply an amendment and an addition to our present copyright law, and if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas should prevail the effect would be to strike down the value of our domestic copyright law.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHACE. With great pleasure.

Mr. CALL. How can he say that by this amendment our domestic copyright law will be affected at all? That law does not apply to foreign authors; it relates to our own authors and such foreign authors as may be resident here.

Mr. CHACE. That is very true; but if the Senator will consider for one moment he will see that in a previous section of this bill we have struck out the provisions debarring foreigners, and that has spread the operation of our copyright law over the world. Now, it is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to allow the importation from abroad of books copyrighted here, and that operates upon every provision in the copyright law as it stands on the statute-book; and the result will be that the Government of the United States will be deprived and debarred of the power under the statute to protect our own citizens. I will read to the Senator the provisions of the law as it at present stands:

SEC. 4964. Every person who, after the recording of the title of any book as provided by this chapter, shall within the term limited, and without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright first obtained in writing, signed in presence of two or more witnesses, print, publish, or import—

I ask Senators to notice that word "import"— or import, or knowing the same to be so printed, published, or imported, shall sell or expose to sale any copy of such book, shall forfeit every copy thereof to such proprietor, and shall also forfeit and pay such damages as may be recovered in a civil action by such proprietor in any court of competent jurisdiction.

There is the statute on our book to-day, and yet the Senator from Kentucky rises in his place here and says this bill proposes to make an inroad on our existing legislation.

Mr. CALL. That relates only to domestic production, the book copyrighted here, the American author or the foreign author who comes here or is resident here, and therefore it has no relation to the subject-matter of this bill, which applies to the foreign author who is not resident here.

Mr. CHACE. But we have amended this section and amended the present law, and now you propose to emasculate it by striking out this section.

Mr. CALL. Then I understand the Senator—I had not observed the amendment—to say that the law is amended so that the foreign author may copyright his book in the United States without being a resident here; but the condition remains that he must publish it here with American material and with American type.

Mr. CHACE. In other words, I repeat, we have upon our statute-book now a copyright law which provides that a citizen or a foreigner residing in the United States may acquire copyright under certain conditions. One of the conditions is that the book must be printed and published in this country. It can not be imported. Now, what does this bill propose to do? It simply proposes to extend the privileges of copyright to the citizen of a foreign country upon precisely the same conditions that we have put upon American copyright, and I ask any Senator if he can name now any reason which should move a member of the Congress of the United States to grant to a foreigner the privileges of copyright with any less restrictions than we put upon our own citizens.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that under the law as it stands at present a foreign book may be imported into the United States by paying a certain tariff duty. It seems to me that the American people have some interest in that fact, that they have some right to import foreign books if they choose to do so and read them, by paying the tariff duty. Now, when we pass this bill, I do not propose to cut off that right to any extent; but to allow them to stand precisely as they are now with regard to foreign works, and if they wish to import foreign books by paying the same tariff duty that they are required to pay now, that they should have the poor privilege of doing so, and that they shall not by the enactment of this law which is proposed to protect foreign authors be deprived of the right to get books from abroad by paying the tariff which they have now the right to pay upon their introduction.

We certainly do no wrong by this; and it seems to me there can be no sort of question that if we accord to foreigners the right to come here and get our copyright, the American readers ought to have the right, if they choose to do so, to import foreign books by paying the rates of tariff duty imposed on those books. That is the gist of my amendment. It will do no harm, and it seems to me we ought to do no less for American readers.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question, in view of the law which he has just read and which I understand to be the law that has existed for years on our statute-book——

Mr. CHACE. It is the existing copyright law.

Mr. GRAY. It prohibits the importation into this country of any imported books that are copyrighted here. That is the substance of it.

Mr. CHACE. That is the law, and I will say to the Senator that there are one or two exceptions which are provided for by special statutes.

Mr. GRAY. But that is the general scope of the law.

Mr. CHACE. That is the general scope of the law fairly stated.

Mr. GRAY. I want to ask the Senator whether, in case this amendment of the Senator from Arkansas were adopted, that law which he has just read would still apply to prohibit the importation of a copy of a book copyrighted under this international law?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. By an American author.

Mr. CHACE. I understand the American author is protected—entirely so.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I do not think that is a legitimate construction of that law. The American author would still have exactly the same rights he has now under the law, and the European author would simply be required when he came here to take out his copyright, and the right of the American reader to acquire these books if he chooses to do so by paying the ordinary duties would be preserved.

Mr. CHACE. I appreciate the motive of the Senator from Arkansas; I understand perfectly well what he wishes to get at; and I desire to say that I know he is honestly in favor of according to foreigners their full privileges of copyright here, and I do not wish to be technical with him. However, I am entirely satisfied that his amendment would be fatal to the bill. This is no new subject to me. This bill has been elaborated after the most careful consultation and consideration by men eminent in the law who have made copyright law a specialty. The bill has been elaborated and brought out by men some of whom are the most pronounced free-traders in this country. It is honestly advocated by pronounced free-traders in this country, and I say to Senators here, if the Chair will pardon me, that if you adopt this amendment you will emasculate the bill.

I ask the Senator from Arkansas, suppose he strikes out this provision in the bill, and suppose a copyright is taken out in this country and some printer sets up a press in Denmark, a country which is not in the International Copyright Union, and you have no provision to prevent the ingress of books so printed into this country, being editions of works which are copyrighted here, you have stricken out all power of exclusion. That foreign publishing house within the territory of Denmark may put any imprint it pleases upon those books and bring them to your custom-house and enter them and spread them broadcast all over this land and you have no means of preventing it. You have destroyed the power under the statute to protect not only the foreign but the American author. You have stricken down the whole force and value of your law.

Mr. KENNA. May I be allowed to ask a question in that connection for information, because I am not unfriendly to this bill? I understand the object of the Senator from Arkansas and the manner in which he proposes to accomplish that object. He seems to think that the duty imposed by the existing statutes on the importation of a book would be in itself a sufficient margin of difference between the foreign production and the production here. If that is so I am entirely satisfied with the amendment.

Mr. CHACE. I will reply to the Senator that it is very possible that within one year or two, or five, or ten years the duties may be taken off books. It is the earnest hope and expectation of many of our friends on the other side of the Chamber and of many of the earnest friends of this bill that that day may soon come. On this side it is the ardent hope and expectation that that day may never come, "one of whom I am." Nevertheless the question of the tariff, as I have said over and over again, can have no possible influence on the effect of this law. If you pass this bill and strike down the duty on books it will have no effect whatever. You have no means under the tariff act of ascertaining, unless you make some provision in this statute for ascertaining, whether a book is copyrighted when brought into this country or not. What right has a collector of customs to investigate that question unless you make some such provision?

Mr. KENNA. I have not been engaged in the discussion and do not desire to follow it up; but what led me to make inquiry was what appeared to be an anomaly to me, that you should in the first place allow a foreign writer of a book to come into this country and secure a copyright, and at the same time have in force on your statute-book a tariff on the importation of foreign books which your copyright will exclude from being imported.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator from West Virginia well knows that the present domestic copyright law only applies to citizens of the United States.

Mr. KENNA. I am talking about your bill that you propose to adopt, by which you provide that the foreign author of a book may come into this country and have his book printed in American type; I do not know where that type is to be set.

Mr. CHACE. In this country.

Mr. KENNA. Well, set in this country. He is protected against competition because of the exclusion which his copyright gives him, but at the same time your revenue law imposes a duty on the importation of that very book.

Mr. CHACE. Very well. The revenue laws apply to all books. There are a great many books which have long since passed out of copyright. This bill is not retroactive in any sense. It is a matter of great complaint on the part of authors of Great Britain to-day that this bill is not made retroactive. They say, "We have copyrights running, and it will not apply to such books." There is a vast sea of literature in existence on the other side in all languages that we are drawing upon constantly, and these duties apply to all such books. The importations of such books no doubt will continue. There is no doubt that a great many books will be published hereafter, if this bill becomes a law, which will never be copyrighted in this country.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that an American author can now copyright his book in England and in most foreign countries if he does so before publication here and by producing the book over there?

Mr. CHACE. I would say to the Senator from Florida that the people of Great Britain have set us a very fine example of liberality and comity and good neighborship between nations. The English Government are very liberal. They have enacted a statute which is rather onerous in its provisions, which requires previous publication in Great Britain, but out of their extreme liberality they have construed the law that, if a book is published the same day over there that it is here, it is published previously, so they give us copyright by our authors going to live on that soil.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me ask the Senator how is it about the English law regarding books brought there by travelers, French or German books that you or I may have coming from Paris to London. We may have one little book that we have bought on the continent, a novel, or whatever to read; but it is taken from us at the English custom-house.

Mr. CHACE. I will say in regard to that, that you must have an English copyright edition and then you are all right. But I want to say further that the provisions in this bill that seem to be regarded as so onerous by Senators are simple and harmless and inoffensive compared with any amount of British free-trade legislation on the same subject. They seize the tobacco pipe as they seize tons upon tons of literature that has been imported into Great Britain, and American citizens have had books taken away from them at the custom-house and burned up.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the Senator another question. Is it not true that a British author can come to the United States and obtain a copyright?

Mr. CHACE. He may come here to live. The author must come here and live, but we do not construe that matter of residence as liberally as the English courts do. The foreign author is debarred from the privileges of copyright in this country.

Mr. CALL. I understand temporary residence is required; and so the law now is that an American author must publish his book and copyright it in England by a temporary residence, and the British author or any other foreign author can copyright his book in the United States as the law now is by simply sending here and publishing it.

Mr. CHACE. That is a most extraordinary statement. I ask the Senator from Florida to cite me to a single English copyright ever taken out in this country.

Mr. CALL. I can not cite the Senator to one.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator is mistaken; that is all.

Mr. CALL. Is not that the law of the United States, that by residing here he can publish a book and copyright it?

Mr. CHACE. But the residence is construed to be a real residence and not a technical one, as it is in Great Britain.

Mr. CALL. That depends on who construes it.

Mr. CHACE. The courts.

Mr. GRAY. As I read the law quoted by the Senator from Rhode Island, section 4964 of the Revised Statutes for the protection of American copyright, it provides that:

> Every person who after the recording of the title of any book as provided by this chapter, shall, within the term limited, and without the consent of the proprietor of the copyright first obtained in writing, signed in presence of two or more witnesses, print, publish, or import, or, knowing the same to be so printed, published, or imported, shall sell or expose to sale any copy of such book, shall forfeit every copy thereof to such proprietor, and shall also forfeit and pay such damages as may be recovered in a civil action by such proprietor in any court of competent jurisdiction.

That law has been deemed sufficient for the protection of the domestic copyright, that is for the copyright of an American book, and has been, I take it, the law of the land for some time.

Mr. CHACE. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAY. One moment.

Mr. CHACE. I thought I would save the Senator a little, but I will wait.

Mr. GRAY. That is the law to-day for the protection of the American owner of a copyright. Now, we propose by this bill to amend the Revised Statutes so that the copyright privileges secured by our copyright law shall not be confined to Americans, but may be extended to foreigners who under certain conditions prescribed shall enjoy all the privileges of the protection of our copyright laws. So, then, after this bill presented by the Committee on Patents has become a law, it seems to me that the foreigner who expects to enjoy the privileges therein extended will come within the provision of section 4964, because it reads that—

> Every person who, after the recording of the title in any book as provided by this chapter—

And the chapter will have been so amended on the passage of this bill as to include foreigners—> shall within the term limited import a book so copyrighted—

Shall be subject to such penalties as are named in the section. So the passage of this bill with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, which strikes out all these harsh provisions contained on page 2, requiring the burning of the books, the consent of the author, and a great many additional restrictions beyond what are deemed necessary to protect the American copyright, will leave the law in such a condition that the foreign owner of a copyright will be precisely on a par with what has been the status of the American owner of a copyright heretofore; and it seems to me with that he should be content.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator thinks he would still be prohibited from importing the book?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. CHACE. Then why object to the provisions of this statute?

Mr. GRAY. Because they are a great deal more harsh and a great deal more stringent than seems to be necessary. They require the books to be burnt, etc. Whatever we may think of section 4964, it is the law to-day; whether it be a wise law or not, it is the law; and it seems to me it should apply for the protection of the foreign copyrighter when this bill passes, if it does pass, and so those words ought to be stricken out.

Mr. CHACE. Then the Senator from Delaware concedes the whole point except that he does not like the provision that the book shall be destroyed. If it be in the way of harmony to expedite the passage of this bill I do not know that I would object to substituting a provision to have the books forfeited.

Mr. GRAY. I am not making any point about it. I like the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas; but I do not understand why the Senator from Rhode Island, who is advocating the bill, should so insist upon these particular and peculiar provisions in regard to the importation of a book that is copyrighted, when the existing law, which has been considered sufficient for the American copyrighter, would apply to the foreigner when the bill passes.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator from Delaware will perceive, if he will examine with care, that the provision is drawn with special reference to what is necessary to protect the foreign copyrighter here. It is not likely, and it has not been found to be the case, that foreign publishers have attempted to print American books and introduce them into this country, infringing our copyright laws. The temptation has not existed. But if you grant a foreign author a copyright for books which he publishes abroad, the temptation then may exist. You do not want to grant him a privilege and at the same time throw open the door which will infringe on the rights of your American copyright.

Mr. GRAY. But are not copies of American copyrighted books printed abroad, and can they not be imported?

Mr. CHACE. They can be imported.

Mr. GRAY. And is not the American copyrighter exposed to that danger from which this section designs to protect him?

Mr. CHACE. He is exposed to it. The law prohibits it, as you see, in section 4964.

Now, I want to say one word further in regard to the amendment. I take it the Senator from Arkansas does not mean his amendment in all the breadth and scope he proposes. He would strike out the provisions in regard to translations. I take it he does not mean to do that. He would strike out the provision in regard to section 2505. I take it he does not mean to do that. In other words, this amendment will throw the bill out of harmony with itself, destroy its unity, and it will almost emasculate it. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHACE. We are about to vote on the bill. I ask for a vote now on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee insist on his motion?

Mr. HARRIS. If I was sure we could come to a vote without further debate, I would withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let us have a vote.

Mr. CHACE. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will let us have a vote.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senate will come to a vote at once, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CHACE. Give us a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. KENNA. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present, but I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. FRYE (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HALE] is necessarily absent from the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. FAULKNER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). My pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] is transferred to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] in reference to this amendment and in reference to the bill. The Senator from South Carolina is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania. I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If the Senator from Vermont were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when the name of Mr. VANCE was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is necessarily at home. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS (after having voted in the negative). I voted on this question, but I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], and as he is not here, and I do not know how he would vote, I must withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLAIR (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. The Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea," and I believe the Senator from Nebraska would vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. I announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. BLAIR. Is my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] paired? He is absent in the service of the Senate. I do not know whether he is paired or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no pair announced for the Senator's colleague.

Mr. KENNA. There is a pair between the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. As far as we can we will transfer our pairs with Senators on the other side.

Mr. BLAIR. I have the consent of my colleague and of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to transfer his pair to my colleague, and so I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA. I believe all the absentees are paired.

Mr. BECK. My pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been announced. How he would vote has not been stated. I am satisfied the Senator from Maine would vote "nay" if he were here, and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 19; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CHACE. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. HARRIS. I do so cheerfully.

Mr. CHACE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on this question and on the bill to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can not get unanimous consent when you have no quorum.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill will come up regularly to-morrow.

Mr. HAWLEY. We shall get a vote then, I guess.

Mr. HARRIS. I move an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 1, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 30, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PARKER, on important business, until further notice; and also to Mr. LEHLBACH, on account of important business, until May 3.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the printed RECORD of this morning, on page 3649, I am recorded as having stated in the debate on Saturday afternoon:

The list of the bankruptcy courts for the last ten years in reference to the manufacturers of Massachusetts will show how many of them are being paralyzed.

I said, or meant to say, the "woolen" manufacturers of Massachusetts; and I beg that the RECORD be corrected by the insertion of that word.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Why did you not go on and explain why this paralysis had taken place?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Because I was so broken up by interruptions and questions from the other side that I could not get to the statement of the fact that they were paralyzed by reason of high taxes on the raw material.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Why did you not explain that they were paralyzed because of certain rulings by the Secretary of the Treasury? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman can explain that when the proper time comes. This, I understand, is only a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. What page does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Page 3649.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The RECORD I hold in my hand does not extend beyond page 3636.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I suppose the gentleman has the wrong RECORD. The correction I ask to make simply refers to the insertion of the one word "woolen" before "manufacturers."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 9445) creating the seventh judicial district of Dakota Territory, and providing a judge therefor, has been erroneously referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Without objection, that committee will be discharged from its consideration, and it will be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of revenue bills.

The SPEAKER. That motion, the Chair thinks, could not be entertained until after the morning hour for the call of committees. Besides, this being Monday, the first business in order under the rule is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. MILLS. But I understood the agreement with reference to the debates to cover Mondays as well as other days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the order made, and re-examined it since the question came up a few days since. The order does not set apart any days for the discussion of the bill known as the tariff bill. That is, it does not mention any specific days, but simply provides there shall be seventeen days' debate. Such orders are frequently made by the House—that when such matters are pending in Committee of the Whole there shall be so many hours' debate, but they do not fix the specific hours. It means that so many days shall be devoted to the discussion, such days as the House shall see proper to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for that business.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This day by the rules of the House is set apart for the call of States and Territories; and under the rules that will be the first business in order.

Mr. MILLS. Then I ask unanimous consent to dispense with that call.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask the gentleman to allow bills to be presented at the Clerk's desk for reference.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BURROWS. I have a bill which I desire to offer and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

Mr. BURROWS. No; I shall not object if the bill is printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Then without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

CLASSIFICATION OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (H. R. 9737) to classify pensions and to facilitate the prompt settlement thereof, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed, and also printed in the RECORD.

It is as follows:

A bill to equalize pensions, to facilitate prompt settlement thereof, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, upon application therefor, the names of the surviving honorably-discharged officers and enlisted men of the military and naval services of the United States who actually served ninety days, or more, subsequent to the 4th day of March, 1861, and prior to the 1st day of August, 1865.

SEC. 2. That pensions under section 1 of this act shall be at the rate per month of 1 cent for each day's service rendered, and payable only from and after the date of the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto: Provided, however, That in each and every case where the service so rendered was less than eight hundred days, the pension shall be at the rate herein established for a service of eight hundred days, to wit, $8.

SEC. 3. That all invalid pensioners who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Pension Office, or before Congress, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such form as he may prescribe, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim and receiving his pension under any other general or special act at his election at any time: Provided, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period.

SEC. 4. That if any honorably-discharged officer or enlisted man of the military or naval service of the United States, who served during the period specified in section 1 of this act, has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, such widow shall be placed upon the pension-roll, upon her application, at the rate of $12 per month: Provided, That said widow was married to the deceased officer, or enlisted man, prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That all pensions granted to widows under this act shall take effect from the date of death of the husbands of such widows respectively, but not dating from any date prior to the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That rank in the service of any officer or enlisted man shall not be considered in applications under this act.

SEC. 6. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensions under this act: Provided, That this act shall not apply to those persons under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ one thousand clerks, or such additional force as may, in his discretion, be deemed necessary, additional to those now employed in the Pension Bureau, to adjudicate all claims arising under the provisions of this act within two years from the date of the passage thereof. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ five hundred additional clerks, or such force as may be necessary, in the office of the Adjutant-General, United States Army, to dispose of the increased work consequent upon the passage of this act. And be it further enacted, That the several United States pension agents be authorized to increase their clerical force, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to an extent necessary to promptly dispose of the increased work consequent upon the passage of this act, not to exceed twelve at each agency, and whose salaries shall be paid out of the moneys to be appropriated by this act.

SEC. 8. That so much as may be necessary to pay the pensions provided for in this act, and to pay for the increased clerical force in the offices of the Commissioner of Pensions, the Adjutant-General, and the United States pension agents hereinbefore authorized to be employed, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 9. That any agent, attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim under this act who shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain, for his services or instrumentality in presenting and prosecuting such claim, a greater sum than $10 (payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed), or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due such pensioner or claimant, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no fee whatever shall be allowed to any person whomsoever in any case where an invalid pensioner is granted an increase under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 10. That all the laws or parts of laws which conflict with the provisions of this act shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

COMMISSION ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I was detained from the House on Monday by its order, on the Committee on Manufactures, and I wish also to make the same request as the gentleman from Michigan in reference to a bill that I would have introduced at that time had I been present.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The bill (H. R. 9738) providing for the organization of the commission of fish and fisheries and defining its duties, introduced by Mr. DUNN, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed, and also printed in the RECORD.

It is as follows:

A bill providing for the organization of the Commission of Fish and Fisheries and defining its duties.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to continue the systematic investigation of waters of the United States, and of the biological and physical problems they present, with the object of determining the character, abundance, geographical distribution, and economical value of the inhabitants of the waters, both salt and fresh, as also their migrations and the cause influencing or regulating the same. This investigation is to be conducted on a broad and comprehensive plan, so as to arrive at the life history of all species having economic value, as well as of those species to which they are intimately and essentially related.

SEC. 2. That he will continue the investigation into the history of the methods and apparatus of the fisheries and for the preservation and utilization of fishery products now in use, and will cause careful study to be made of new methods and apparatus introduced from time to time, with the object of determining their effect upon production, and furnishing the information upon which to frame intelligent legislation regulating the conduct of the fisheries and improving their methods and apparatus.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to provide for the collection of the statistics of the fisheries of the United States, especial reference being had to the fisheries of the Great Lakes and of the New England and North Pacific coasts of the United States, which are of international importance and may influence or become the subject of treaty stipulations. The statistical inquiry hereby authorized and directed shall be comprehensively planned to accomplish the purposes for which it is instituted.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to continue the work of artificial propagation of food-fishes and other useful inhabitants of the water, with a view to their introduction into and establishment in the interior and coast waters, and to the maintenance and improvement of the important commercial fisheries of the coast and interior lakes and rivers. To this end he will in his annual estimates transmitted to Congress provide for the maintenance and operation of the existing stations of the commission, and for the maintenance and operation of such additional permanent and field stations as may be from time to time authorized and directed.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries shall appoint such employés as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to those of similar officers in other departments of the Government, and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons, of expert knowledge, for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, naturalists, and physicists, for the conduct of the researches and investigations required in the performance of the duties devolved upon this department, or which may be from time to time authorized and directed by Congress.

CONVICT LABOR.

Mr O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the following petition in relation to convict labor; also the bill H. R. 8716 upon that subject, reported favorably from the Committee on Labor, and which will, during the next few weeks, be called for passage.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, introduced the following bill:

A bill to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who knowingly transports, or causes to be delivered for transportation, from the State or Territory in which they are in whole or in part manufactured, any goods, wares, or merchandise, in whole or in part manufactured by convict labor in any penitentiary, prison, reformatory, or other establishment in which convict labor is employed, to or into any other State or Territory, or into the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment at the discretion of the court, and such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act by any person making the complaint under oath, and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect at the expiration of sixty days from and after its passage.

The petition, which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Labor, is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners most respectfully represent that they are citizens of the United States, engaged in industrial pursuits; that the prevailing system of employment of convict labor in the prisons of the several States operates unjustly and injuriously upon your petitioners and other citizens engaged in like productive industries, by imposing upon them an unjust, unequal, and ruinous competition in the markets of the country with the products of such convict labor, and that they believe no adequate relief can be afforded unless through the intervention of your honorable bodies in their behalf.

They likewise most respectfully represent that practical experience teaches that such system fails either to reform the convict or to deter the evilly disposed from the commission of crime; that it tends to degrade free labor, to harm honest workmen, to ruin long-established industries, and to impoverish the deserving citizen without profiting the State.

Your petitioners submit that it is manifestly unfair and unjust that the State should enter upon an unequal and injurious competition with honest citizens, or unnecessarily employ its prisoners at such labor as lessens the wages and subverts the industrial interests of those engaged in productive occupations. That many of the most influential of the States have officially declared that the evils resulting from the present systems of employment of convict labor are serious and widely distributed, and conceded that no general system of regulation or cure can be established by State legislation, and that national legislation and mediation are required to afford adequate relief, and that Congress can alone confine trade within State lines and harmonize conflicting State interests. Your petitioners beg leave to add that this is one of those exigencies of general concern that the framers of the Constitution undoubtedly had in view when they so wisely conferred upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce among the several States, establish justice, and promote the general welfare."

Your petitioners do not believe that the State should support its convicts in idleness, but that their reformation should be the paramount aim of prison discipline, and all mere economic considerations be subordinated thereto; that the State should stimulate them to acquire habits of industry by paying to them at their discharge a reasonable proportion of their earnings, and by teaching them complete trades, and not parts of trades, as under present systems.

Your petitioners believe that if the following system of employment of convict labor were generally adopted the evils of which they complain would be substantially removed without loss to the State and with benefit to the convict; to wit: The public-account system alone used; prisoners confined to hand trades or to unskilled labor; the number of industries enlarged, including as few domestic industries as possible; the number of prisoners lessened by establishing reformatories in which shall be confined such as have been convicted of a first offense, not punishable with death, or for life; all public institutions supplied by prison-made goods, and all prison-made goods duly marked as such before offered for sale. They earnestly commend likewise that the hours of labor be lessened and additional time employed in the moral instruction of convicts.

Nevertheless, until such a uniform system has been established by the several States employing their convicts in skilled labor, your petitioners earnestly insist that the interests of honest labor engaged in productive industries imperatively demand the intervention of your honorable bodies in their behalf, and pray that an act be passed prohibiting, under adequate penalties, the sale or offering for sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the product in whole or part of convict labor, outside of the State in which they are manufactured.

Finally, they pray your honorable bodies to take such action, the premises considered, as may be fitting to secure the joint action of all the States employing their convicts in skilled labor, to the end that such a general and harmonious system, consistent with the rights of the national and State governments, respectively, may be established as will protect free labor engaged in productive industries, tend so far as practicable to the reformation of the convict, and "promote the general welfare."

SANDY HOOK SHIP-CHANNELS.

Mr. SPINOLA submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a detailed statement of the work being done in deepening the Sandy Hook ship-channels, giving the terms of the present contract, the facilities of the contractors for doing the work, the amount of material removed by the said contractors to date, and the estimated amount of material yet to be removed under the contract, and also at the present rate of progress what length of time will be required to exhaust the present appropriation of $750,000, and who, if any one, is to blame for the apparent neglect in pushing forward the work according to the terms of the contract.

PROTECTION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. PERKINS presented the following petition; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Petition for more effectual protection of agriculture.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned farmers of Cherokee County, Kansas, respectfully pray that agriculture may be more effectually protected, as follows:

First. By preventing fraudulent importations of cattle on pretense that they are for breeding only.

Second. By a duty of 20 cents per bushel on barley, with proportionate increase of duty on malt.

Third. By duties of 25 cents per bushel on potatoes and onions, $2 per 100 on cabbages, $3 per ton on hay, 10 cents per pound on hops, 20 per cent. on beans and peas, 5 cents per dozen on eggs, 30 per cent. on fowls and poultry, and on "vegetables in their natural state, or in salt or brine, not otherwise provided for," with no removal or reduction of duties on market-garden products now dutiable.

Fourth. By such increased duties on flax and on linen goods as will effectually encourage the preparation of fiber and manufacture of goods.

Fifth. By abolishing all duty on sugar, with a bounty to home producers.

Sixth. By repealing all internal taxes on tobacco, and preventing imports of leaf-tobacco suitable for wrappers at the duty imposed on other leaf-tobacco.

Seventh. By restoring to wool-growing the substantial protection enjoyed under the tariff of 1867, so modified as to meet the later forms of foreign competition and of evasion.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. I desire to present resolutions of 3,276 members of the St. Louis Circuit of Turners, and approved by the Turnverein of Highland, relative to immigration. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

Hon. JEHU BAKER:

From the time of our independence and organization of this Republic our country has been a safe asylum for the oppressed and those who were persecuted for their opinion.

The natural resources of our country were developed and made useful to mankind by the endurance and industry of its inhabitants, who to a great if not the largest part were immigrants.

The naturalized citizens were, during the rebellion, true and loyal to our Republic, and in great numbers acquired honorable right of citizenship by service in the Army and Navy.

The existing laws for the regulation of immigration, if carried out in their true sense, are fully efficient to exclude all laborers imported under bond or contract, all convicts, cripples, paupers, idiots, and insane persons.

It would be a violation of personal right and of the spirit of the declaration of men to make that a test of citizenship or permission to reside in this country.

The Constitution of our Republic guaranties the right of free immigration, free thought, free speech, and free belief to mankind.

The vast Territories of our country, with their inexhaustible resources, are fully able to support hundreds of millions of striving and industrious humanity; to afford them a free homestead and a wide field for their exertions.

Prompted by these facts the St. Louis Circuit of Turners has passed the following resolutions:

1. That we enter our solemn protest against the passage of any laws tending to make the right of immigration dependent upon the personal views of the immigrant, or which may be construed so as to restrict or impede immigration.

2. That the existing laws, directed against importation or landing of bond-slaves, laborers under contract, criminal convicts, insane people, and paupers, should be strictly enforced by the authorities intrusted with their execution.

3. That these resolutions be spread upon the records of the St. Louis Circuit of Turners, and that its executive board be instructed to send a certified copy of the same to each Senator and Congressman of this circuit.

4. That the president of the Circuit of Turners of St. Louis be held to request Hon. JEHU BAKER to present these resolutions in the name of 3,276 members of the St. Louis Circuit of Turners in session of Congress.

FRANCIS P. BECKER, President.
[SEAL.] ARTHUR BOSCH, Secretary.

Approved by Highland Turnverein.

JACOB MAECHTLEN, President.
[SEAL.] EDMUND KNOEBEL, Secretary pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I renew my motion that the morning hour for the call of States and Territories be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the revenue.

[Mr. GROSVENOR withholds his remarks for revision. [See APPENDIX.]

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Chairman, if the House will grant me their indulgence upon the paramount question that will claim our attention during this present session I shall be thankful for their patience, which I know has been taxed and strained in listening to discourses upon the subject of the tariff. My remarks shall be very brief, because I do not propose to treat it as a question of theory or political economy, and because I appreciate the fact that the country is tired of hearing speeches on this subject.

In 1884 the Democratic party, in convention assembled, denounced the injustice of the existing tariff and, in tones of thunder, proclaimed all through this land that Federal taxation should not exceed the requirements of the Government economically administered. Now, what the people are anxious to find out is, whether this was merely a tirade of glittering sentiments or whether it was a solemn pledge that the party proposes to redeem? If the former, then let us announce it so that our constituency can understand that, while we are ready at all times and upon all occasions to abuse and vilify the tariff, when the time arrived for action we became so fascinated by the lovely creature that we were unwilling to raise our hands to strike a single blow for fear that we might spoil or mar the symmetry of her charms or the beauty of her proportions.

You gentlemen upon the other side of the Hall are not in the position that we are in; you promised to do nothing, and you have faithfully kept your promise, and I respect you for it. When your platform declared that the tariff should be revised the people expected nothing from such a declaration, and their expectations have been fully realized. The country is looking to the Democratic party alone for deliverance. The question is, shall we proceed forward to victory and to the post of a nation's honor, or backward to disaster and defeat? We have no right to halt and raise a flag of truce to parley; if that was our intention we ought to have said so upon the floor of the convention. If we expected to be controlled by local interests and to present a divided front and to break up into fragments upon this vital issue, why then our platform was a snare and the emblem on our banner was an artifice and a lie. As far as I am concerned I am here as the representative of the people, and not of any class or section, and I stand by the terms of the covenant.

I have heard it said that the resolution of the platform calling for revenue reform was the joint product of a high-tariff Democrat and a free-trader; if this is so, then the high-tariff man occupied the position of a fraudulent debtor, who was willing to give his opponent a judgment because he expected to defeat him on the execution. The judgment is recorded and it contains not a sentence or a word that breathes an uncertain sound. It is as clear as language can be made to express the thoughts of man. I defy any one present to point me to any utterance on this platform, upon this subject, of doubtful or ambiguous signification. If there is a stroke of diplomacy in it, let some Democrat arise upon this floor and shield himself beneath it. If there is an avenue of escape, let him take it. If it contains a single prop that will sustain the incumbent weight of the existing tariff or that will authorize a Democrat to defend it, let us hear it. The Democratic party issued to the voters of this country revenue-reform notes, upon the strength of which it received their suffrages and came into power as a political party.

The question now is, shall we pay or shall we repudiate? The money is on hand, the paper is maturing a hundred million dollars a year. Shall we meet the issue, or shall we keep on plundering the people and pocketing the funds? I say the time is past for the discussion of questions of political economy. The people at large are now taking very little interest in abstract controversies upon free trade and protection. The thing that they demand is that the Government shall stop robbing them, and then they will argue the proposition whether the Government has the right to rob them. Does this Government need the surplus in order to pay its debts? Not a dollar. Does it require it to pay its expenses? Not a dollar. Well, what is it for? To protect. To protect whom—the people? I deny it. The laboring man? I deny it. The agricultural interests of the country? It is absurd. Whom, then? Why, centralized wealth that needs no support, sapping the earnings of the poor, and overgrown monopolies that require no protection, draining the life-blood of the country. We might as well meet the issue fairly and squarely and admit that this contest is one between the protected monopolies and protected capital on the one hand and the unprotected people and the unprotected tax-payers on the other, and in this contest I stand with the unprotected people for revenue reform against their financial oppressors.

I am not an extremist upon this subject. I am unwilling, on the one hand, to repeal our present system of import duties, and I am unwilling, on the other, to make custom-house taxation the instrument of enriching the rich and still further impoverishing the poor. Now, does this system impoverish the people and protect those who are not entitled to protection, and whom it is a shame and a crime to protect, at the expense, the toil, and the suffering of their fellow countrymen? A patient study of this question in its practical details has satisfied me that it does. Let us admit, for the sake of argument, that protection benefits the owners of your timber lands and your iron fields and the proprietors of your mills and manufactories. Let me ask, has this Government gone into permanent partnership with the capitalists of New England and Pennsylvania; and, if so, how long does the Government propose to keep on contributing capital to the firm?

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you favor putting coal upon the free-list?

Mr. RAYNER. Coal is not in this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I would like to know if the gentleman will join me and others in a vote to put coal on the free-list.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, the question now before the House is the discussion of this bill, and as coal is not in this bill I do not propose to answer that question at this time. I can tell the gentleman, however, that there are other industries that affect me much more closely than coal. My district is affected (if any district is affected) by this bill and there are numbers of articles that come much more closely home to me than coal; so that the gentleman might have put a far more pertinent question than the one he did put.

Of course I do not for a moment mean to say that this bill is the perfection of human wisdom, or that it will not be modified and amended; nor do I mean to preclude myself from voting for amendments to it, but I do bind myself to stand by the bill in whatever shape it may come out of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am willing to stand by my party. [Renewed applause.] Will you [addressing Mr. DINGLEY] vote for the bill if we put coal on the free-list?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will answer that when the bill is completed. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYNER. Well, when you answer my question I will answer yours. We will both answer together. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask again, how long is this partnership to continue between the capitalists and the Government? The people are becoming poorer all the time and the firm is becoming richer. Every hundred million dollars that passes into the Treasury makes the nation a hundred million dollars poorer and the protected industries a hundred million dollars richer. Is this false or true? If it is false, then protection does not protect. If it is true, then it is a fraud that ought to be crushed and swept from the statute-book. Who is there here in favor of the perpetuation of the present system?

Mr. BAYNE. Why, there was a delegation here the other day.

Mr. RAYNER. A delegation?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAYNER. How many?

Mr. BAYNE. They represented the entire Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers.

Mr. RAYNER. Does not the gentleman know that nineteen-twentieths of the laboring men in this country are employed in pursuits that are not affected by the tariff except detrimentally? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. I do not think so.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, I know it, and I stand ready with the statistics to support that statement. I have never heard one word about that proposition from the other side of the House. I say that five men out of every one hundred of the laboring men of this country are protected and the other ninety-five are taxed to death in order to protect the five. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. My friend from Maryland asked whether anybody was here. I merely pointed them out.

Mr. RAYNER. They were a part of the five who are protected at the expense of the other ninety-five who are not protected.

Mr. BAYNE. They were here all the same, and never got a hearing.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir; and all of these men are sent here under a deception practiced on them by their employers, that if you reduce the duties on the articles they manufacture it will be necessary then to reduce their wages. Now, I say it is not necessary to reduce their wages; that it is not necessary to strike down a dollar of wages because of the reduction proposed on any article manufactured by these men.

Mr. BAYNE. Let me put in the gentleman's remarks that some of these men to whom he refers can come on the floor of this House of Representatives and put to shame a large majority of the members of Congress in the discussion of the tariff question. I say, sir, they can do that.

Mr. RAYNER. I have no doubt of that. I have heard the finest discussions from labor representatives of my own city; I have seen men with as much learning and as much eloquence, perhaps, as I have ever seen in this Hall addressing the assemblies and organizations of labor.

But that is not the point to which I am speaking, as to whether these gentlemen can or can not address the House on questions of political economy, but the question I am dealing with is, should not the men engaged in the industries benefited by the tariff have a share in those benefits? I say that the statistics show that ninety-five out of every hundred laboring men are employed in industries not affected by the tariff, and I turn you to the tables of our statistician on this point. The question is, what is the proportion which those men who are protected bear to the men who are not protected, the bricklayers, carpenters, and men engaged in the hundred and other occupations who are entirely untouched by the tariff, except as it raises the price of the food they eat and the clothes they wear? [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN and Mr. NUTTING rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, to both of the gentlemen.

Mr. NUTTING. There are thousands of men in this country engaged in making glass; you know that.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, I do.

Mr. NUTTING. You know there should not be a reduction of the tariff on glass.

Mr. RAYNER. I am glad to answer that. I am frank to say I think the committee made too large a reduction on glass, and I shall vote for an amendment to keep the duty on. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen, do not laugh till I am done. While there might be a small reduction on glass, I do think the reduction which the committee has put upon the bill is lower than it should be; but I also say if that reduction in the tariff on glass is enacted into law it affords no justification for any glass manufacturer in the United States to reduce the wages of his employés one cent, for there is enough protection left on this article as well as on every other article to enable the manufacturer to pay easily the difference between the cheap-price labor in Europe and the higher-priced labor here. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You may take this in the way of an answer. You may take the wages of the Silesian linen weavers—— [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. NUTTING. No; let us take the glass-blowers in Belgium.

Mr. RAYNER. The unskilled mechanic gets about one-half of the wages of the unskilled American mechanic. There is not that difference between the wages of the skilled labor in glass manufactures in Belgium and the skilled labor in the glass manufactures in the United States.

Mr. NUTTING. You have not quite answered my question; you have answered it in part only. The gentleman is quite candid; but will you say to the House right here—because I think you have answered this question as far as you have gone fairly—will you say to this House whether or not the reduction in glass, as shown by this Mills bill, does not put the laboring men engaged in the business in our country directly in competition with the laboring classes of Europe engaged in working glass?

Mr. RAYNER. As I stated my position a moment ago, I do not think it does. I can select three or four articles to which, in my judgment, modifications can well be made in this bill. I do not in any event think the duties ought to be reduced to the extent they are reduced here on the Mills bill on glass, and I wish to be perfectly plain about that. I do not think the manufacturer has free raw material, coal, soda ash, etc., and he is therefore entitled to protection more than other industries.

If, the manufacturer of glass in this country takes down wages after the passage of a slight reduction, he is using the bill as a pretext to oppress and impoverish men for his own profit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NUTTING. But the gentleman does not come to the point.

Mr. RAYNER. Have you glass interests in your district?

Mr. NUTTING. I have glass-works, and am familiar with the business; but you have not answered my question. I ask the direct question, and I hope the gentleman will answer me yes or no, whether or not in his opinion the reduction in the tariff upon glass, as shown by the Mills bill, does not put the laboring men employed in the glass industry in this country in competition with the laborers in the glass-making business in Europe and elsewhere?

Mr. RAYNER. I repeat that upon particular articles of glass, as embodied in this bill, the duty, I think, is too much reduced. I have individual opinions upon that. I do not think there ought to be such a reduction of duty, and at the proper time—because I am not precluded from discussing that—I shall give consideration to that point and vote to put the duty back, with the understanding that whether the matter of the bill is exactly to my liking or not—because it is a Democratic measure—I shall vote for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is more, I think, than any of you gentlemen can say on the other side, for I have never heard from any of you any speeches during this debate, or at any other time, which did not indicate that you had some particular interest in hand to support.

Mr. NUTTING. I have great respect for my friend from Maryland, but I am very sorry to hear him say upon the floor of the House that, though there is something wrong in this bill, that no matter for that fact, upon the whole, when it comes to the question of supporting the bill, he will vote for it.

Mr. RAYNER. How often has the gentleman refused to follow his party upon party measures? I follow my party upon this great issue, the issue of the hour; and I have no right, sir, to look to any industry in your district or in my district or in the district of any other man in this country when the great fundamental question before the whole country is, whether or not the systematized plan of robbery and plunder which has been in existence so long shall be kept up against the rights of the whole American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NUTTING. Now, I ask the gentleman——

Mr. RAYNER. Now, let me go on, for there are more things than one to which I was to allude.

Mr. NUTTING. But this question I would like to have answered.

Mr. RAYNER. The gentleman says that he comes from a district where glass is manufactured.

Mr. NUTTING. Yes, sir; where more than two thousand men are laboring to-day and every day in the year in that industry, and every one of them has sent petitions to me asking and begging Congress not to reduce the tariff upon glass.

Mr. RAYNER. They have sent me the same petitions.

Mr. NUTTING. And I respect their wishes.

Mr. RAYNER. So do I. I have a number of petitions besides in other industries.

Mr. NUTTING. The only difference is that the gentleman from Maryland will not obey it. You say you are in favor of them, and yet you pay no heed to their wishes when expressed in the recognized manner.

Mr. RAYNER. I came here in the interest of the whole people. [Applause.] If the gentleman came solely to protect a class interest of the country, we differ. You come solely to protect the glass interest of the country, to perhaps insure your own election, and let every other interest go. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NUTTING. Now, my friend, let me say——

Mr. RAYNER. You represent a fair sample of some gentlemen on the other side of the House. You have no regard for any one of the four thousand articles on the tariff except glass, and because that is what you directly represent. I am here as a representative of the people and of all their interests, and of no particular interest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NUTTING. Just a word now. Will the gentleman not permit me? I have a very great respect for the gentleman from Maryland; great indeed. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I can stand to talk with him here or anywhere else, until he comes down to the question of personalities, and then——

Mr. RAYNER. Oh, I have said nothing on earth personal in my remarks. I am treating now of a great public question, and have no desire to be personal. I think the gentleman and myself can stand together, perhaps, on the question of glass, and he ought not to quarrel with me.

Mr. NUTTING. Now just wait awhile.

Mr. RAYNER. We both live in glass houses. [Applause.]

Mr. NUTTING. I may get you with me on some of the industries, perhaps. You said a little while ago that I represented the glass interest solely. Now, the city in which I live contains one establishment where there is manufactured more starch than in any other manufacturing establishment of the kind in the Union.

Mr. RAYNER. Do not let us get on starch now, if you please.

Mr. NUTTING. But I represent that interest here.

Mr. RAYNER. You represent nothing but interests. Let us keep to one thing at a time.

Mr. NUTTING. In that establishment are fourteen hundred men laboring. Those fourteen hundred men have asked me, and they would ask you if they thought it would do any good, that the tariff on starch be not taken off in this bill. Will the gentleman follow me in that?

Mr. RAYNER. I will cut this matter short by saying that when the time comes you will find the Democratic workingmen of Baltimore marching to the polls and voting for President Cleveland. I expect that is what you want to find out.

Mr. NUTTING. Not if you give them a fair vote.

Mr. RAYNER. The fairer the vote the larger the majority.

I am opposed to every scheme that contemplates the yearly and continual appropriation of this surplus towards the purchase or conversion of Government securities. I am opposed to such suggestions, because the remedy is only temporary, and because, sooner or latter, the issue now before us must be met, and it is as well to meet it now as at any other time. The problem we have on hand is not a financial one at all, it is not one upon which it is necessary to consult the representatives of large moneyed interests, or fiscal agents, or experts, or anything of the kind. Let us return the money to the people, and then we will not encounter any difficulties about the proper application of it. I am opposed to using this money for the purpose of subsidies in any shape. In common with every citizen of this Government who has at heart its welfare and its perpetuity, I would like to see an American Navy eclipsing the armament of any government on this earth. I would like to see the ports and harbors of this great country aglow with the activity of the mechanic and the inventor to send forth upon the sea not only a merchant marine flying the colors of the Republic, but a power that, in time of war, would become the terror of the ocean and bid defiance to the squadrons of the world.

Yet, notwithstanding all this, I am willing to subordinate every feeling of national pride to this the paramount issue of the hour, and that is, shall the people day after day be plundered in the interests of monopoly? And shall a lobby, standing at the door of legislation, representing millions of centralized wealth, throttle the appeal that comes up from the bosom of this land, demanding relief from the most inequitable and oppressive system of taxation that is to be found anywhere in any civilized country on this globe. I am opposed at present to any interference with internal-revenue taxation, except perhaps the tax on tobacco for the sake of compromise. What an answer it would be to the toiling millions of this land to say to them: We have heard your appeal for relief; we have been deeply moved by the justice of your demands; you are burdened by an oppressive system of taxation, and are pouring into the Treasury unneeded hundreds of millions of dollars produced by labor and wrung from poverty——

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Before I yield to the gentleman let me finish this sentence.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It is a very good sentence, I know.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, it is.

We have, however, devised a remedy that will relieve you of your burdens and that will scatter contentment broadcast throughout this land; that remedy is free whisky—in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, for now and for evermore a panacea for all your ills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me now for a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My question pertains to the first half of the gentleman's handsome sentence. In what form has the bill for the relief of the laboring men of this country made its appearance in the House of Representatives?

Mr. MILLIKEN. That was the question I desired to ask the gentleman.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not spoken of any bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You say they appeal to you to be relieved from the burdens now resting on them.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the gentleman think all the laboring men of this country can come together into this Hall? If they wanted to appeal, could they get in here?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If this Hall were equal in size to some of your statements they might get in.

Mr. RAYNER. The gentleman speaks of exaggeration in my speech. I will say of his speech, deferentially, de minimis lex non curat. That is not unparliamentary. We have heard from every public source it is possible to imagine, we have heard from every newspaper and journal except the newspapers subsidized by the protective leaders, the demand that Congress shall pass some measure for the relief of the consumers of this country. If you have not heard that demand you have been so busily engaged that you have not read the daily papers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask the gentleman, have not the Knights of Labor upheld the doctrine of protection?

Mr. RAYNER. Not that I know of.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then you have not read the daily papers.

Mr. RAYNER. I know it is not so in Maryland. There are eight thousand Knights of Labor in my city, and I think I can speak for them. And I beg to say there never has been a labor assembly convened in my district that has passed a resolution in favor of a protective tariff, and a large number of them are Republicans. They know they are being plundered by the monopolists, and the laboring men of my district vote against your monopolists all the time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has any of them appealed to Congress to repeal duties on imports?

Mr. RAYNER. Who has appealed to retain the duty on imports, except the New York Tribune and other papers that your party is subsidizing?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Millions of men have sent petitions here in favor of continuing present duties; and I have myself filed petitions of a great many thousands.

Mr. RAYNER. That is a broad statement. We will not go into that general discussion. We have both been members of legislative assemblies—the gentleman I suppose much longer than I have. You might flood that petition-box with thousands of petitions, and there is not a human soul that would ever read them or pay the slightest attention to them. The newspapers are the exponents of public opinion. You may take the newspapers, except some published in some of the manufacturing districts, and you can not find any paper published in any village or hamlet or city of this country which for the last two years has not been appealing to Congress to grant relief from this odious and oppressive system of taxation which is grinding the people to desperation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the Irish World in New York make that appeal?

Mr. RAYNER. The Irish World is a good paper, but I have not had time lately to read it. I get the Irish World regularly, but I have not time to read it lately, and I will read this article. If the gentleman wants to know anything about the Irishmen in my district I can inform him they are all right. They are Democrats, in sunshine and in storm. Now I hope the gentleman will let me finish my sentence.

We propose to say to the people: We have well considered the great questions you have submitted to us of relieving from taxation the common necessaries of life, but there are so many conflicting interests to consult in regard to them that we have abandoned the idea of giving you that kind of relief, and in lieu of free wool and free salt and free lumber and free clothing, why, delirium tremens shall be placed upon the free-list, and from now on all kinds of ardent spirits shall flow like milk and honey in the land of promise. It is true that a great many of you may be of the opinion that this sort of legislation will be detrimental to the morals and the happiness of your countrymen; but this Government must reduce its revenues, and mania a potu is the only raw material in the production of which we can compete with any foreign country on this globe. If the cities become too crowded, and farming lands too thickly cultivated in the agricultural districts of the West, then the genial climate of our Territories affords a field for the production of this article and the free enjoyment of it unexcelled in any region of the world. As far as I am concerned, I shall stand upon this floor until I sink in opposition to any such measure.

As much as I feel for the States that it is said will be beneficially affected by such legislation; as deeply as I sympathize with the destitution, the trials, and the sufferings of their people; as gratified as I would be to help Virginia and her sister commonwealths in any effort to promote their prosperity and relieve them from the blight which has followed in the track of war, and which has almost turned into a withering wilderness regions created in the prodigality of nature, I will never consent to sacrifice the rights of the people of this country for the benefit of any class, or State, or section, and I shall never, with a willing hand, open the flood-gates through which the crimson tide of vice and crime shall inundate this land and poison the hearts and desolate the homes of my countrymen.

Now, my friends, if internal-revenue taxation is not to be entirely repealed, if the surplus is not to be squandered, then there is only one course left to pursue, and that is to reduce the surplus by reducing the tariff. Now, how shall the tariff be reduced? I say strike for the raw materials; select those that can stand the change and will be least affected by it, and then reduce the duty upon every product into which the raw materials enter. I am an advocate of free wool; I would rather see wool upon the free-list than any other of all the four thousand articles named upon the schedules—first, because the tax on wool is the greatest burden upon the consumers of this country of all the hardships and all the burdens imposed by the present tariff, and second, because I firmly believe that, from the moment you make wool free and reduce your duties upon woolen manufactures, from that moment you not only revive one of the greatest departments of industry in our midst, but you will enable the skill and handiwork of the American mechanic and the fabric of the American mills to cross the sea and vie with the manufactured products of every country in all the markets of the world. I wish I had time to enter into a discussion of that matter now, but I have not.

I want to recur for one moment, however, again to the subject of wages in connection with the tariff.

Workingmen of America, do not let demagogues deceive you on this subject! Both parties want your votes; there is no doubt about that. Now, will you give them to a set of adroit and cunning leaders who are using you for the purpose of benefiting the monopolists whom they represent; or will you follow the party that is making an honest effort to crush the monopolists who have reaped at your expense all the profits and benefits of the protective system? The Democratic party has stood by you and will continue to do so. The Republican party has always been the ally of centralized wealth, of large moneyed interests, and of corporate rapacity arrayed against the rights of labor. Do not let them frighten you into the belief that your wages will be affected; they will not be affected to the slightest extent, but on the other hand your cost of living will be reduced, and you will just pay about one half for the raiment that covers you, for the articles you consume, and for the necessities of life.

European labor can never compete with American labor. It is the countries that pay the highest wages that bring forth the cheapest products, and statistics show that the capacity and producing power of the American laborer and the skill of the American mechanic find no peer in any country on this earth. You earn every dollar of your wages, because you produce twice and thrice as much as the laborers of other countries. You are under no obligation to any party for paying you living wages. The law of supply and demand regulates that. And while I am on this subject I defy any one to point me to a single article of all the four thousand on the schedule which requires labor, upon which the American manufacturer does not receive protection more than three times the difference in wages between the lowest priced labor in Europe and the highest priced labor in America. Name if you can the product upon which this does not take place. Now is it not a fraud and a falsehood to assert that because duties are lowered a trifle so as togive the laborer cheaper clothes and food, that the manufacturer will be compelled to reduce wages with this immense protection in his favor? Why are not wages higher now in the manufacturing industries? They ought to be, and I will join hands with you in adopting some system to increase them a little. I have stood by the laboring man here and his rights and interests from earnest conviction, while you gentlemen who are now so zealous in his cause have abandoned him in the interests of the monopolist and of Pennsylvania boards of trade and of the New England trusts.

Now, gentlemen, you have been very kind to me; if you will give me ten or fifteen minutes more I will conclude. I want to touch upon a subject that is near to my heart, and which is in direct connection with the subject-matter under discussion. I want to call your attention to a proposition upon which a great many of you will agree with me.

I desire, within the brief space of a few moments, to call your attention to a system of monopolies that are gradually growing up in this country under the fostering protection of a high tariff, of the most destructive tendencies, as far as the interests of the people are concerned. They are known under the name of trusts, a modern invention under an ancient title; and a measure is now pending in this House to prevent their growth and abridge their power. They have sprung into existence so rapidly that it has been impossible to apply the remedy in time. But if the most heroic steps are not promptly taken to impede their insidious advance it is safe to predict that in a short while the consuming public of America will be at the mercy of concentrated capital to such an extent that private enterprise will be seriously affected, legitimate competition in a great many departments of industry will be forced to abandon the field, and the prices of some of the principal commodities of commerce and of necessary consumption will be arbitrarily fixed and regulated by those who supply them and control their production, manufacture, and sale.

The proper definition of this character of trust is this. It is a combination between owners and producers of certain articles of merchandise to keep up the prices of the manufactured product, to suppress competition, to bankrupt private investments, and to compel the public to pay such rates as the combination may determine upon. They are not creatures of fiction; they are living realities, ramifying through almost every State and section of this country. They are of illegitimate birth; they have been nourished by the most corrupting influences, and to-day, largely with the aid of a protective tariff, they command the home markets and overshadow the business centers of this land. In their inception they are hostile to the spirit of our laws, and in the accomplishment of their purposes they are at war with the free spirit of our institutions.

I have not the time now to enter into a detailed statement of their operations. I propose to do this hereafter. The States are powerless to eradicate them, because their existence is not dependent upon local legislation. They go far beyond all the assumptions and arrogance of corporate power, and, as has lately been determined, they are not within the reach of the tribunals of this land, unless this body, under its constitutional authority to regulate commerce between the States, will pass a law forever invalidating the contractual obligations that bind them together and keep them alive. This is what the bill that I have offered proposes to do. It seeks to strike at the root of the evil and to crush these monstrous combinations before they can successfully defend themselves upon the plea of an ex post facto law.

The principal trust, and the pioneer that cleared the way, is the Standard Oil Company Trust, whose history, as it has defied the sovereignty of the States and their tribunals, is one of fraud, corruption, and oppression. A few years ago it started with a capital of a million of dollars. It then commenced to absorb refineries, pipe lines, transportation lines, and every competing enterprise that obstructed its track, until, to-day, paying an annual profit of $25,000,000 upon a capital of $150,000,000, it has crushed to destruction private enterprise in the line of its traffic in every State of the Union into which it has emigrated. It wields an enormous influence that enables it to defy the law and to control legislatures, and its triumphal acquisitions have left behind them such an attendant train of disaster and misfortune that no one dare raise his hand against its overpowering front, unless at the peril of destruction and annihilation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question now?

Mr. RAYNER. I will. I like questions.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman consider that the tariff is at fault in connection with the Standard Oil trust?

Mr. RAYNER. That is a very pertinent question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does not the gentleman know that there is no protective duty on petroleum?

Mr. RAYNER. There are thirty-one of these trusts now in active operation; and out of the thirty-one twenty-six are protected by tariff duties, as I can prove. The Standard Oil Company is one of the five that are not affected by a protective tariff; but I think I have the right to advert to it in this connection.

A MEMBER. How about the sugar trust?

Mr. RAYNER. It would be crushed to atoms if the duty were taken off refined sugar.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why has it not been taken off in the Mills bill?

Mr. RAYNER. Is there no other article among four thousand that might be enumerated on which gentlemen can ask to have the duty removed? Why select a single article and ruin one State? Why not distribute the reduction equitably and rationally among various articles?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Was not the Standard Oil trust, with petroleum unprotected, the pioneer, as the gentleman calls it, in these "trusts," and the greatest and worst of all?

Mr. RAYNER. It was.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Then how can the gentleman lay the blame to the tariff?

Mr. RAYNER. I will come to the other trusts if gentlemen will let me proceed for a few moments.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me say to the gentleman that I am with him in regard to these "trusts." I will go as far as he will in crushing them out. I have already introduced two resolutions looking to an examination into the sugar trust; but a Democratic committee of this House has refused to report those resolutions favorably.

Mr. RAYNER. I am in the same boat with the gentleman. I have had a bill before the committee for three months, and it appears to be buried in the tomb of the Capulets—to be sleeping the sleep that knows no waking.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Am I to understand that the gentleman in condemning the Standard Oil Company speaks for the present Administration, of which Mr. Cleveland is the head?

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Cleveland is not the president of the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. CANNON. I am asking whether the gentleman, in condemning the Standard Oil Company, speaks for the Administration.

Mr. RAYNER. No, sir; I do not speak for the Administration at all. I have never even had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Cleveland. I am the only man on the Democratic side who has never seen him. [Laughter.] I can not speak for him at all. I do not even speak for Mr. Lamont.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to follow that question by another. Does not the gentleman know that this Administration has appointed one of the principal representatives of the Standard Oil Company, at least by relation and probably otherwise—the Secretary of the Navy—and that another one is a Senator of the gentleman's own party from the State of Ohio?

Mr. RAYNER. Do you think the fact that a man is the son-in-law of somebody connects him with the fraud of which that person may be guilty? Suppose your father-in-law or son-in-law were engaged in some conspiracy to defraud the people; I would not hold you responsible. [Laughter.] I believe I can vouch for Secretary Whitney that he has not the slightest connection in the world with the Standard Oil Company. But it does not make any difference who is connected with it. I do not care whether the men engaged in it are Democrats or Republicans, silver men or Greenbackers. I do not care who has any connection with; it is the greatest fraud on the people that has ever been perpetrated.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I simply want to deny the imputation that has been cast upon——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois on the left [Mr. CANNON] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. It appears, then, that in condemning the Standard Oil Company (and I unite with the gentleman in that condemnation), he speaks for himself; I speak for myself. The gentleman is not speaking for the Democratic party or the Administration.

Mr. RAYNER. That is correct. I am speaking of what I know of the history of that company from beginning to end; and I do not care if the best Democrats in the United States are connected with it. This is no political question at all.

I wish I had time to illustrate this point. I say to you that a starving army, foraging upon the enemy's lines, never scattered in its path devastation equal to the ruin occasioned by this commercial buccaneer in its freebooting expeditions through the prosperous homes and business centers of this country.

This is not an exaggerated statement, and I only wish that I had the time to follow this company in its march to aggrandizement and convince you how heartlessly it has depredated upon, plundered, and bankrupted every legitimate investment that interfered with its avarice and rapacity. Animated by the lead of its successful example one trust after another has sprung into activity until now pools and corners and combinations to regulate prices are the order of the day.

You have a sugar trust which is laying an infamous tribute upon sixty millions of people, and which, with a defiant hand, has swept away all formidable opposition until to-day it sits in colossal state and dictates to the consuming public of America the price of one of the absolute necessities of existence.

You have cattle trusts, and steel and glass and salt and rubber and coal trusts, representing hundreds of millions of dollars, until at this moment industry after industry, responding to the roll-call, is mustering its recruits ready to register themselves under the banner of monopoly.

What has been the actual result of all this? Prices have been raised, legitimate competition has been throttled, and the individual who for a time has refused to surrender has been compelled at last to abandon hope and place himself at the mercy of these relentless combinations.

Now, is there no remedy for all this? I think that there is. Every trust of this character depends upon the faithful performance of the contract of trust by those who have entered into it, and, as I have said, they are bound to enter into it to save themselves from bankruptcy, and they are bound to remain in it in order to keep their assets from depreciation and their business from financial ruin.

Now, how can you keep them from entering into it and still save them from the impending doom that now threatens them if they do not yield? Why, by reducing the tariff by making the contract of trust, with all its incidents, unlawful, and proscribing the execution of such a contract under the severest penalties.

I am prepared by an unbroken line of the highest authorities to maintain the constitutional power of Congress to pass an enactment of this sort, and I earnestly believe that from the moment that it is enacted its practical effect will be felt in every mart of commerce and in every channel of trade to the confines of this Republic. There is no difficulty about the remedy. The question is whether we are prepared to adopt a remedy, and whether we are prepared upon this issue to take a stand unswerving to the last degree.

Now, what is the situation? On the one side stands monopoly, with the centralized wealth of the country behind it, and with all the political influence that it can possibly procure—absolutely unscrupulous as to the instrumentalities that it employs to appease its ravenous greed. On the other side stand the people, without a dollar, appealing to their representatives in Congress here assembled to relieve them from the tramp of an iron heel that day by day is driving and crushing them to desperation.

As far as I am concerned, every earnest impulse of my being is enlisted against these deadly alliances that are pilfering the earnings and plundering the homes of our people, and I thank Providence that in this contest, standing shoulder to shoulder with us, is a fearless press—a press that can not be bought or bribed or subsidized.

A famous statesman once said, "Give me a free press and I will defy them to encroach a hair's breadth upon the liberty of my country." I say, give me an honest press, whose editorial columns are not for sale, that can not be swerved by favoritism or pacified by patronage, and I will defy them to encroach one hair's breadth upon the rights of the people.

Now let me say to you in conclusion, I do not think that this subject requires any prolonged investigation. I deny the necessity of it. That these systems exist is a matter of public proof and notoriety, of which this body must take official notice. That we have the power here and authority to sweep them from the face of this Republic is a proposition beyond the border-line of a reasonable doubt.

I am prepared by numberless constitutional authorities to maintain the constitutionality of the bill which I have offered in Congress for this purpose. I say postponement means destruction to the business interests of the country. Public opinion has condemned them and the hour has come to carry out the sentence. Do not give them one moment of unnecessary respite. We can not permit the commercial integrity of the land to surrender to them, because the flag that they unfurl is the pirate's ensign that gives no quarter and shows no mercy.

Mr. KERR. Let me ask the gentleman if he is not more in favor of that bill than of this?

Mr. RAYNER. I will say no; I am in favor of a modification of the tariff in preference to anything else. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, that question is easily disposed of.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. WEBER. I understood the gentleman awhile ago to enumerate the list of trusts that he claims are in existence owing to the tariff laws.

Mr. RAYNER. I said some were; not all of them.

Mr. WEBER. Please inform me how the tariff, a quarter of a century old, has developed these trusts only within the last few years.

Mr. RAYNER. My dear sir, I must refer you for information upon that subject to your own distinguished exponent of high tariffs on that side, Judge KELLEY, for that information is embodied in his own speech.

Mr. WEBER. Will you answer the question, then, yourself?

Mr. RAYNER. I have given the gentleman a reference.

Mr. WEBER. Was the gentleman here on Saturday?

Mr. RAYNER. I was not.

Mr. WEBER. The gentleman was not.

Mr. RAYNER. No; I was at home preparing my speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBER. I did not know but that the gentleman was participating in the hospitalities extended to members at Philadelphia on that day.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not time to indulge in such luxuries. I have had no picnic since I have been here.

Mr. WEBER. I am glad to hear it. But if you had been here you would have had an opportunity to read in the papers (not the Irish World or Hebrew Herald to which the gentleman referred) an article in which it was stated that a "gun trust" had been formed across the water.

Mr. RAYNER. Gum trust?

Mr. WEBER. No; gun trust.

Mr. RAYNER. Where?

Mr. WEBER. In free-trade England.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, what has that got to do with the question?

Mr. WEBER. Only to show that the tariff is not altogether responsible for such things.

Mr. RAYNER. I did not say that it was. I said that most of them were the result of the tariff. I stand here to say that but for the tariff most of them would expire.

Mr. WEBER. The gentleman does not stand here to answer questions impossible to be answered.

Mr. RAYNER. I answer the gentleman's question most cheerfully by saying that I do not think a protective tariff is absolutely necessary to the existence of these combinations or trusts.

Mr. WEBER. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so.

Mr. RAYNER. It is only a fact, for they have existed from time immemorial for all purposes. But as I stated, I have statistics here—but I do not care to go into statistics now—showing that of the thirty-one trusts now in effective operation in this country twenty-six of them are protected by the tariff. That was the extent of my remark.

Mr. WEBER. Most of them have come into existence within the last two years.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, suppose they have; what does that show?

Mr. WEBER. It simply shows that the tariff had nothing to do with their formation.

Mr. RAYNER. Has not there been a tariff for the last two years? If you reduce the tariff, I can say to the gentleman one thing with certainty——

Mr. WEBER. What is that?

Mr. RAYNER. That they will die an early death, in the first stages of their innocence.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the Standard Oil trust die?

Mr. RAYNER. Most likely not. But there is no difficulty about breaking up trusts; but it must be done by law. You can break up the Standard Company, but it must be done by law. My law will reach it.

Mr. BAYNE. But there is no law for it.

Mr. RAYNER. No; but you can break up a great many others of them by lowering the duty.

Mr. BAYNE. But the tariff has nothing to do with the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. RAYNER. That may be; but it has with twenty-six out of the thirty-one, and if the gentleman wants to see the list I can show it to him. Twenty-six of these are protected.

Mr. BAYNE. They have big trusts in England, too, where there is free trade.

Mr. RAYNER. But nothing like we have here.

Mr. BAYNE. No; because they have not the money coupled with so many diversified interests.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the gentleman think they have not the capital? Why, they have more capital in one little ward in London than we have here all together in Congress.

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, I guess not.

Mr. RAYNER. They have not the same protection that we have, that is the difference.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Democracy here to stand true to their colors. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I appeal to them to stand up to the traditions of our party. A tariff for anything else than revenue is outside the traditions and principles of our party, and at war with its pledges and history. It is foreign to our platform. We have given to the people the assurances of our intention to do this. Let us prove our faith by our works. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us engrave upon the imperishable tablets of the law the truth of the doctrine we have proclaimed.

If you want the Democratic party to live, give it a principle that will sustain it. If you want it to die, stimulate it with a policy foreign to its nature, which will destroy it just as surely as poison will consume the human frame, though it may for a time impart to it the glow of youth and flush of health. A man can not, at this time, upon this floor, be a Democrat and be in favor of the continuance of the present system. If he is for protection for protection's sake, then he is against his party upon the principal issues that divide the parties. [Applause.]

That is right; you applaud my remark. [Continued applause.]

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERR. Then why is it that another gentleman on that side declared in his speech that in the platform of the Democratic party, which he then quoted, there was no room left for the internal-revenue system. Can the gentleman explain that?

Mr. RAYNER. It is not necessary for me to explain that. I have heard in this debate some funny things which I can not explain. I can not explain what other people mean. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the gentleman who made that statement said he was the only member on this floor who was on the committee which framed the platform of that Democratic convention.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not know who the gentleman is, but in my opinion they should put him under the platform. I heard a gentleman on the other side of the House say that he put a lot of questions which he knew were conundrums that could not be answered.

I deny the right of any Democrat to be controlled by local interests upon this subject. In a few months from now you will be called upon to go before the people again in a fierce struggle for party supremacy. My fellow-Democrats, what do you propose to say in your convention upon the subject of the tariff? What account do you propose to render to the people of your stewardship? If you break your promise now, do you suppose that they will believe any other promise that you make them? Never. I make no claim to political prophecy, but I believe, as surely as the sun will rise upon the morrow, that if, under the pressure of local influence, we beat a cowardly retreat now, the party is doomed, and doomed it deserves to be, because a party does not deserve to live that has not the moral courage to stand by its convictions. [Applause.] And let me say to you that you will not be able to call upon President Cleveland to save the party. The splendid record that he has made will be of no avail. Our sins of omission and our violated vows will be too heavy a burden for any one man to carry. [Applause on Republican side.] And what will the leaders of the Republican party say? Why, that we nailed a lie upon our banner; that we went through every town and village and hamlet of this land and shouted revenue reform, and pledged our troth to the people to relieve an overburdened Treasury of its stolen plunder, but that when the drums beat and the roll was called we took refuge in a sutler's camp and sold our birthright for a mess of pig-iron and a herd of sheep.

I am for revenue reform because I am a Democrat; not of that sort of Democracy that gathers its inspiration from the blast furnaces of Pennsylvania or the woolen mills of New England, but a Democracy that can point to Mount Vernon's shades and Monticello's heights and say that from the day of its birth it has been the mortal enemy of monopoly; and when it strikes it down, as strike it down it will, upon its ruins it will live. Its manhood asserted, its promises fulfilled, and its honor vindicated, it will receive, under the leadership of him who leads it now, and who, in my opinion, is as fearless a foe as corruption ever encountered, the renewed fealty of the people; but if it yields to the tempter's touch, if it breaks its ranks and locks hands with the monopolists who have been gathering their iniquitous toll for a quarter of a century at the ports of entry of this Republic, and who are here now infesting the avenues of legislation, then in my opinion its handwriting is on the wall and its destiny is closed, for treachery can never triumph and a lie can never live. [Great applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, Mr. CHAIRMAN: In discussing the tariff I am bound to say at the very outset that men may honestly differ on this great economic question. There are no juste grounds for the sharp words that too often pass between the conflicting parties. It is a purely business matter, in which we, as representatives of a common country, are interested in wisely legislating for the good of the people of this nation.

It is only a few years ago that I as honestly believed in free trade as I do to-day honestly believe in protection.

The proposition of having free trade, open and inviting ports between the nations of earth, is most captivating to the young mind. I can well recall the time when I and the young students of my acquaintance had scarcely decent toleration of any doctrine that did not look towards open ports, open doors, unlocked windows, international courts that would put an end to armies, fleets, and human carnage, and that aimed to reach a point when all restraints should be removed from the individual, save the protection that enlightenment and a clean conscience would give. We wanted to drift away from the law-making, law-construing, and law-executing machinery of government, so that every dollar earned by the individual might go into chairs, carpets, libraries, clothing, in brief, home comforts and luxuries, and not into the pockets of an army of government officials and men trained to cut throats, shoot, and kill their fellow-men.

There are but few young men who read, think, and aspire for the best in life that do not entertain these glorious day-dreams of a millennium upon earth; I do not aim to attack this line of thought. But I have learned in the school of experience that we can not take the locks from our doors and windows while the armed thief is concealed in the door-yard waiting for the darkness to cover his crime.

We can not abolish our armies and abolish our military and naval schools while other nations are increasing their muster-rolls, augmenting their navies, and choking their arsenals with improved implements of death.

Neither can we open our ports for free entrance to the rest of the world while all the great commercial nations on earth relentlessly close their ports in our faces. Nor am I prepared to open our ports, even if they are (as they are not), until their people are on as high and as generous a plane of life as are the people of the United States of America.

ALL THE GREAT NATIONS OF EARTH PROTECT THEIR HOME INDUSTRIES.

Their doors are closed against us. I see it stated in a Democratic paper that Germany collected tariff duties on the flowers that were sent from abroad as a tribute to the dead Emperor. Even England, which comes nearest to free trade, finds plenty of methods, and at great expense to the general government, to protect the industries of her people.

Observe how cunningly but firmly great European powers shut their ports against the hog products of our American farmers; and yet, we are asked to respond by inviting Europe to enter freely and occupy our markets.

These powers across the seas are all smart enough to look out for "Number one." My oath and yours bind us to the same policy.

The unit—the "No. 1"—which you and I are bound to look out for, is not the world, but our own good land, the United States of America.

If our unit of thought in this discussion is the world, we are bound to advocate free trade. If it is the country under whose Constitution we are sent here, then our duty is to advocate everything that will protect and make prosperous and happy our own American people.

I have said that honest differences of opinion may be held on this question, but I have indicated that free-trade opinions should be confined to youth and inexperience. It should be tolerated in the student and the purely book philosopher. But I am at a loss to understand how any man who becomes a part of the business, throbbing life of this country, and who has marked its progress and happy conditions under protection, can be a sincere advocate of free trade.

Mr. Chairman, President Cleveland in his extraordinary message speaks of "our present tariff laws" as "the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation." In these and other expressions coming from that source, the President is understood as challenging the wisdom of the laws which have contributed so much to our national prosperity. He throws the gauntlet at the foot of protection and stands boldly forth as the champion of free trade. His message is so interpreted by the leading lights of the Democracy both here and in England.

The sentiment in Europe towards the President, and their construction of his message, may be gathered from the following extract from the letter addressed to me from a personal friend who is now in Europe representing a business that brings him in constant contact with the manufacturing interests of the Old World.

Under date of January 26, he writes:

The tariff question is the absorbing topic of conversation, and you can readily imagine they are all very friendly to the views as expressed by Mr. Cleveland, and look forward with joy to the day, which they think is very near, when they can pour their manufactured stuff upon our market. When next election comes, however, and the G. O. P. comes to the front again and our standard-bearer leads us to victory, we think their fond hopes will be dissipated.

The treatment of the subject on this floor by the Democracy is in harmony with that idea. You snap and snarl at our tariff laws as at things deadly and to be hated. Not one kind, generous word has emanated from your committee in charge of this bill, or from any Democratic speaker here, in favor of that revenue policy which took a bankrupt Treasury, an impoverished and suffering country, languishing in all of her industries, out of Democratic hands and made her the imperial, incomparable, prosperous, happy country of all earth.

While you are in fact for free trade, while it is true that protection and its grand results fret and condemn the Democracy, yet you dare not and can not destroy the Republican-American policy which has marked such mighty and happy results for our people.

PROTECTION IS RIGHT.

There is a right and wrong side to this question. If the doctrine of protection is right, free trade can not be.

I believe in protection. I am not a "high-tariff protectionist." Neither am I a "low-tariff protectionist." I do not know what is meant by those terms. Of course, if I can not reason on this question until I find a major premise on which to build my faith, or if I belong to that class of men who, seeing conflicts of opinion, has not the intellect or the courage to find solid ground and plant himself bravely upon it, I would seek any kind of term behind which to hide uncertain opinions, or to conceal my weakness from the people.

My line of thought on this question is a very clear one to me. I am first looking out for the happiness of the people of this country. I want to make America a beehive of industry. I want to draw all of our people into the varied avenues of work and keep them from the commune. To accomplish this I want all of the material possibilities of this country developed. I want to tap the oil wells, open the mineral mountains, quicken the inventive genius of our wonderful, composite people. I want our prairies, hills, and valleys to groan with food for the millions. I want the music of the hammer, the steam-whistle, the school-bell, and the lowing of the flocks and herds upon a thousand hills.

There are but few human wants that can not be answered on this wonderful continent.

Whatever we do need that this country can not yield for our people I want no tariff duty placed upon it, except in times of war, of great national distress. To thus hold does not make me either a "high-tariff man," a "low-tariff man," a "revenue reformer," or a "free-trader."

Whatever we can make or raise in this country in sufficient quantities to supply the needs of our people I am in favor of protecting with such a duty as will keep other people out of our way and let our own heads, hands, and material supply our own wants. Whatever duty is needed for that purpose I favor, and that does not make me a high-tariff or a low-tariff man, but a protectionist.

If the conditions change, then I will change. We may exhaust certain resources so that the needed supply will fail; then I want the duty taken off and we will buy of the outsiders. On the other hand, when any inventions or discoveries will enable us to develop some new or struggling industry so that it can supply our wants, then I am for protecting that also.

THE SURPLUS.

Now, sir, we find that we are receiving about $60,000,000 annually more than we need to carry on the ordinary expenses of the Government. That is, we have paid off the matured indebtedness of the Government so that the money which had been wisely provided to meet our debts is no longer needed to the amount of $60,000,000 per year. This surplus we all want to avoid. There is not a member of this House that does not wish to avoid the collection of any more money than is needed for the wise and economical administration of the Government. This brings us to the question of, How shall we best prevent the accumulation of this surplus?

I submit that the true rule is to select such subjects for change of law as will least disturb the established business of the country, and at the same time try and find such articles that now bring a revenue, but which do not supply the needs of our people. That is to say, reduce the tariff or wholly remove it from such industries as fail to develop to the point of supplying our wants, or that do not give promise of meeting those wants.

That brings us, it seems to me, face to face with our clear duty, which is to REMOVE THE TARIFF ON SUGAR.

This industry comes within the rule, for it has never reached the point of supplying our wants as a people, and it certainly has had plenty of time and abundant protection.

The following tables, furnished by the Treasury Department, clearly establish my proposition:

a Includes such amounts of beet sugar as may have been imported.
b Leading refiners state that little or no sugar is manufactured from domestic molasses.
c Now manufactured in California only.

It will be seen that the largest amount produced in the United States in one year was in 1861–'62, when it aggregated 539,830,500 pounds, while in 1885–'86 it only amounted to 302,754,486 pounds, being 237,076,014 pounds less than in 1861–'62.

In 1886 we consumed 3,111,640,000 pounds of sugar; more than ten times the quantity produced in this country.

There is a falling off in the production, no increase in the acreage, and there are about seven hundred fewer sugar establishments now than there were before the year 1861. While this is true, our population is rapidly increasing, as is the individual consumption of sugar.

In 1877 we consumed 36 pounds per person annually; in 1884 it reached 53.3 pounds, and last year it is estimated at 55 pounds.

The duties paid in 1886 amounted to $50,265,538, and last year to $56,507,495.

As we produce so small a part of the amount consumed, here is a case where the duty becomes a direct burden upon the people, and it is one that should no longer be tolerated. At all events a very great reduction should be made in the duty, and, if possible, it should be wholly removed.

But I would not abandon this industry, especially as the hope is offered that beet and sorghum raising for sugar-making may come to the aid of the sugar-cane and supply all our wants. Hence I am willing to try a bounty for the benefit of sugar raised in this country. In this matter my own State, Iowa, and this is also true of Kansas, has taken action, and but a few days ago enacted a law giving a bounty to her people to encourage the production of sugar. Here let me invite attention to the views of Alexander Hamilton on the subject of bounties. The views of so high an authority will be of interest.

From the report of Hon. Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, to Congress, made December 5, 1791, on the state of manufacturing in the United States, the following is taken:

PECUNIARY BOUNTIES.

This has been found one of the most efficacious means of encouraging manufactures, and is, in some views, the best. Though it has not yet been practiced upon by the Government of the United States (unless the allowance on the exportation of dried and pickled fish and salted meat could be considered as a bounty), and though it is less favored by public opinion than some other modes, its advantages are these:

It is a species of encouragement more positive and direct than any other, and for that very reason has a more immediate tendency to stimulate and uphold new enterprises, increasing the chances of profit and diminishing the risks of loss in the first attempts.

2. It avoids the inconvenience of a temporary augmentation of price, which is incident to some other modes, or it produces it to a less degree, either by making no addition to the charges on the rival foreign article, as in the case of protecting duties, or by making a smaller addition. The first happens when the fund for the bounty is derived from a different object (which may or may not increase the price of some other article, according to the nature of that object), the second, when the fund is derived from the same or a similar object of foreign manufacture. One per cent. duty on the foreign article converted into a bounty on the domestic will have an equal effect with a duty of 2 per cent. exclusive of such bounty, and the price of the foreign commodity is liable to be raised, in the one case, in the proportion of 1 per cent., in the other in that of 2 per cent. Indeed the bounty, when drawn from another source, is calculated to promote a reduction of price, because, without laying any new charge on the foreign article, it serves to introduce a competition with it and to increase the total quantity of the article in the market.

3. Bounties have not, like high protecting duties, a tendency to produce scarcity. An increase in price is not always the immediate, though where the progress of a domestic manufacture does not counteract a rise it is commonly the ultimate, effect of an additional duty. In the interval between the laying of the duty and the proportional increase of price, it may discourage importation by interfering with the profits to be expected from the sale of the article.

4. Bounties are, sometimes, not only the best but the only proper expedient for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. It is the interest of the farmer to have the production of the new material promoted by counteracting the interference of the foreign material of the same kind. It is the interest of the manufacturer to have the material abundant and cheap. If, prior to the domestic production of the material in sufficient quantity to supply the manufacturer on good terms, a duty is to be laid upon the importation of it from abroad with a view to promote the raising of it at home, the interest both of the farmer and manufacturer will be dissevered. By either destroying the requisite supply or raising the price of the article beyond what can be afforded to be given for it by the conductor of an infant manufacture, it is abandoned or fails, and there being no domestic manufactories to create a demand for the new material which is raised by the farmer it is in vain that the competition of the like foreign article may have been destroyed.

It can not escape notice that a duty upon the importation of an article can not otherwise aid the domestic production of it than by giving the latter greater advantages of the home market. It can have no influence upon the advantageous sale of the article produced in foreign markets—no tendency, therefore, to promote its exportation.

The true way to conciliate these two interests is to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty by way of bounty either upon the production of the material itself or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of things the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable, as to quantity or price of the raw material, and the farmer, if the bounty be immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with foreign material. If the bounty be to the manufacturer, or so much of the domestic material as he consumes, the operation is nearly the same; he has a motive of interest to prefer the domestic commodity, if of equal quality, even at a higher price than the foreign, so long as the difference of price is anything short of the bounty which is allowed upon the article.

Except the simple and ordinary kinds of household manufacture, or those for which there are very commanding local advantages, pecuniary bounties are in most cases indispensable to the introduction of a new branch. A stimulus and a support, not less powerful and direct, is, generally speaking, essential to the overcoming of the obstacles which arise from the competitions of superior skill and maturity elsewhere. Bounties are especially essential in regard to articles upon which those foreigners who have been accustomed to supply a country are in the practice of granting them.

The continuance of bounties on manufactures long established must almost always be of questionable policy, because a presumption would arise in every such case that there were natural and inherent impediments to success. But in new undertakings they are justifiable, as they are oftentimes necessary.

There is a degree of prejudice against bounties, from an appearance of giving away the public money without an immediate consideration, and from a supposition that they serve to enrich particular classes at the expense of the community.

But neither of these sources of dislike will bear a serious examination. There is no purpose to which public money can be more beneficially applied than to the acquisition of a new and useful branch of industry, no consideration more valuable than a permanent addition to the general stock of productive labor.

As to the second source of objection, it equally lies against other modes of encouragement which are admitted to be eligible. As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer. A bounty does no more, but it is the interest of society in such case to submit to the temporary expense, which is more than compensated by an increase of industry and wealth by an augmentation of resources and independence, and by the circumstance of eventual cheapness, which has been noticed in another place.

It would deserve attention, however, in the employment of this species of encouragement in the United States as a reason for moderating the degree of it in the instances in which it might be deemed eligible, that the great distance of this country from Europe imposes very heavy charges on all the fabrics which are brought from thence, amounting to from 15 to 30 per cent. on their value, according to their bulk.

A question has been made concerning the constitutional right of the Government of the United States to apply this species of encouragement, but there is certainly no good foundation for such a question. The National Legislature has express authority "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," with no other qualifications than that. "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to numbers ascertained by a census or enumeration, taken on the principles prescribed in the Constitution;" and that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite, the objects to which it may be appropriated are no less comprehensive than the payment of the public debts, and the providing for the common defense and general welfare. The terms "general welfare" were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise numerous exigencies incident to the affairs of a nation would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used, because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its revenues should have been restricted within narrower limits than the "general welfare," and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition.

It is, therefore, of necessity left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare, and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper. And there seems to be no room for doubt that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce are within the sphere of the National Councils as far as regards an application of money.

The only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question, which seems to be admissible, is this: that the object to which an appropriation of money is to be made be general and not local; its operation extending in fact or by possibility throughout the Union, and not being confined to any particular spot.

No objection ought to arise to this construction from a supposition that it would imply a power to do whatever else should appear to Congress conducive to the general welfare. A power to appropriate money with this latitude, which is granted too in express terms, would not carry a power to do any other thing not authorized in the Constitution either expressly or by fair implication.

We can pay out annually $6,000,000 for bounties, protect the sugar-raiser for what he does accomplish, cut down our revenue $50,000,000, and save that amount to the consumers of the country.

It is suggested by some wise people, and by very many good and noble people, that we should cut down the surplus by removing the tax from distilled spirits and fermented liquors.

In reply to this I have only to say that these taxes were wisely laid at a time when the country absolutely needed the revenue from the same, and being laid on these articles, I am unwilling, for the present at least, to seek a remedy in that quarter. I can not convince myself that it is right to remove burdens from the wine-glass and leave them on the sugar-bowl. I would take the burden from the table of the home before taking it from the counter of the saloon.

THE FARMERS.

What interest has the farmer in tariff legislation? Out of our 60,000,000 people fully 8,800,000 are engaged in agriculture, and over half of our population are depending upon its fruits.

We have not less than 5,000,000 farms worth $11,000,000,000. Our farm products are worth $3,000,000,000, with $2,500,000,000 in live-stock. We have $600,000,000 in implements and machinery. Our fences and improvements amount to $150,000,000.

These are the men and this is the capital that feed the 60,000,000 of people.

They are a hard-working, earnest, intelligent, frugal, and moral element in our busy country. There is no class of our people that must depend so much upon the fidelity of their representatives, for they have not the means, time, or facilities for sending agents and attorneys here to plead for their interests. Let us look to it well that no legislation passes this body that will strike at the interest of this great body of our people.

THEY ARE NOW PROTECTED.

Here are some of the leading products that are protected: Wheat, per bushel, 20 cents; corn, per bushel, 10 cents; oats, per bushel, 10 cents; corn-meal, per bushel, 10 cents; potatoes, per bushel, 15 cents; hay, per ton, $2; oat-meal, per pound, ½ cent; rye flour, per pound, ½ cent; butter, per pound, 4 cents; cheese, per pound, 4 cents; pork, per pound, 1 cent; ham, per pound, 2 cents; tobacco, per pound, 40 to 75 cents; wool (according to grade), 2½ to 35 cents; wheat flour, 20 per cent.; turnips, 20 per cent.; cabbage, 20 per cent.; other vegetables, 20 per cent.; live animals, 20 per cent., except those imported for breeding purposes, which are free; beef, per pound, 1 cent; meat, extract of, 20 per cent.; potato-starch, 2 cents per pound; corn-starch, 2 cents per pound; rice-starch, 2½ cents per pound; other starch, 2½ cents per pound; honey, 20 cents per pound; hops, 8 cents per pound; milk, preserved or compressed, 20 per cent.; pickles, 35 per cent.; currants, 1 cent per pound; fruits, preserved, 20 per cent.

I believe, sir, that if any change is to be made in respect to farm products, there should be an increase instead of a decrease in order that we may keep out Canadian and other competitors. If any one doubts this let him look at the following table prepared for me by the Bureau of Statistics. This will show what Canada is doing now in the matter of stealing the market from our American farmers:

*Not stated separately. † Not stated.

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, March 7, 1888.

Some sneeringly tell us that the farmer needs no protection, as his competitors are too far away to become successful rivals. The foregoing table disproves this assumption. In 1880 Canada alone, after paying the tariff duties, sent into the United States agricultural products amounting to nearly $14,000,000, and in 1887 it was increased to nearly $18,000,000. Take off the duty which holds them in check and the prices for products of the farm would soon be forced down, running the loss to our farmers up to tens of millions of dollars.

And yet, in the face of these facts, the bill now under discussion puts the following agricultural products upon the free-list:

All wools, linseed, garden-seed, rape and other oil seed, hempseed, bulbs, and roots, split peas, beans and peas, milk (fresh), meats, game and poultry, figs, plums and prunes, dates, currants (Zante), vegetables (fresh), bark, beans, etc.: hemp, beeswax, flax, manilla, other vegetable substances.

Instead, then, of extending a helping hand to this great industry, we find the Democracy turning their legislative guns against it, crippling where they should support, and tearing down where they should build up.

THE FARMER MORE INTERESTED THAN ANY OTHER CLASS.

The farmer has a deeper interest in protection than any other class of our citizens, than any other industry in the country. The application of free trade, or of such a reduction of duties as will throw out of employment the non-agriculturist, will be a blow at the farmer which he will feel most severely.

And yet the farmer is the special object of the demagogue, of all men; of all industries this is the one where the enemy of American prosperity most earnestly attempts to deceive and to seek political power at the expense of the farmer's happiness and the general thrift and prosperity of the country at large.

There is not a misfortune that overtakes the farmer but is quickly pointed out by free-traders as the result of protection.

If prices are low for grain or stock, it comes from "the villainous tariff." If the soil becomes exhausted so that 40 bushels an acre of wheat is followed by only 10 bushels, protection is the cause. If the wheat-producing belt moves from Iowa and Southern Minnesota far northward, it comes from "the war tariff." If a young fellow buys 160 acres and mortgages it to build fences and stock it, and with growing family and growing necessities he finds the mortgage slow in lifting, the free-trader hisses into his ear, "It comes from the damnable tariff of the Republicans."

If the wage-earner, the man who works by the day or month, puts his little savings into bank, and the farmer borrows money to put into land, fences, houses, farms, reapers, mowers, cattle, hogs, sheep, etc., he thus having valuable assets while the day laborer has his little saving and his muscles, the farmer is reminded that the tariff is "robbing" him, while the laborer in the city has money in bank.

It is boldly claimed for political purposes that that agriculture is groaning under debts springing from the tariff laws. Tables of mortgages are ground out daily by Democratic newspapers, printed and reprinted as coming from some "official source." They run their tables up into the billions. When men want to deceive in this way it is easily done; the addition of a little cipher at the right of $3,000,000 of mortgages on the Northwestern farms makes it thirty million, and one more cipher and it is three hundred millions, still another and "Presto! change!" the farmers of the Northwest are groaning under a load of three billions of mortgages. This is the modern Democratic method of demonstrating the evil results of protection. I have followed this "farm-mortgage" statement with some care, and I say that no figures have been given to the country by a single Democratic paper or speaker that can be proved to be accurate or anywhere near it. They are cut out of whole cloth for the sole purpose of deceiving.

I saw one of these farm-mortgage tables in the Washington Sentinel of March 3 last. Here is an extract from this paper, and it is going the rounds freely, and has even been put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a speech against public buildings:

Investigation started by the Agricultural Department and pursued by other inquiries have brought to light the mortgages held by Eastern States on the farms of the West. The South is not touched in this particular report. These are the figures of farm mortgages as gathered by the most careful examination of records and other sources of information:

Ohio	$701,000,000	Iowa	$351,000,000
Indiana	398,000,000	Nebraska	140,000,000
Illinois	620,000,000	Kansas	200,000,000
Wisconsin	250,000,000	Missouri	237,000,000
Michigan	350,000,000
Minnesota	175,000,000	Total	3,422,000,000

Observe the devilish cunning of this free-trade item. It comes from an "investigation started by the Agricultural Department." That's a settler, is it not? Again it says, "These are figures of farm mortgages as gathered by the most careful examination of records and other sources of information." This is a clincher! The intent of the "reformer" who got that up (and no one can tell where it started or who started it) was to convey the idea that the "Department of Agriculture" is the real source. And notice again, "a most careful examination of records" was made. What records? By whom made? When made? Will some of these gentlemen get up in this place here now and tell the listening and eager world who did this job? I will yield now for any gentleman to answer these questions. When and where and what records were examined? It was a "careful examination," says the modern Ananias. Please tell us who the "careful," industrious, and benevolent chap is or was that did all this to let the farmers of my State know that they are going to ruin through mortgages put onto them by such rascally robbing protection teachers as Washington, Hamilton, Jackson, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, and Horace Greeley.

Well, sir, I sent the Washington Sentinel referred to—and it is only dealing out the same as the other reform sheets are doing—I say I sent that paper to the head of the Agricultural Department so constantly referred to, with this letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., March 4, 1888.

DEAR MR. COLMAN: I inclose herewith the Washington Sentinel of March 3, and invite your attention to the leading article on the first page, and to that part of it which makes it appear that the statement of mortgages therein given is the result of "investigation started by the Agricultural Department."

I will thank you to return this paper with information as to the reliability of the statement just quoted. Have any such figures been promulgated by your Department? If so, will you kindly tell me the source from which you received them, and oblige,

Very respectfully, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON.

Hon. N. J. COLMAN,
Commissioner Agriculture, City.

Several days went by after I wrote said letter, and failing to get a response, I wrote a second one, and finally the paper was duly returned with my letter of March 4, and an explanation for the delay, and a perfectly satisfactory answer to me as to the authenticity of this $3,422,000,000 mortgage table. Here is the answer of the honorable Commissioner of Agriculture:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
CHIEF CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1888.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed letter and paper, I regret to say, got mislaid by being accidentally placed in the wrong apartment, and has but just come to light. Your second letter with reference to it, however, was answered on the 27th ultimo.

The figures given in the paper as the amount of farm mortgages were not obtained by this Department, nor does it know from whence they were obtained.

Very truly, yours,

NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
House of Representatives.

That letter, sir, disposes of the main free-trade argument of this campaign. The great $3,000,000,000 mortgage table that has been driving the farmer out of house and home is left without a legal parent; it is an unhappy bastard which does not know its father and can not prove that it ever had a mother.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not deny that there are many farms under mortgage, and very many homes, including some of our own which are not situated on farms, that are also under mortgage. Farmers are, like the rest of us, pushing forward on their credit to try and get further ahead and better their financial condition. Many are successful in their efforts. Some are unsuccessful. The situation is well stated by the Commissioner of Agriculture in his last annual report. He says under the head of

DEBTS OF FARMERS.

There are now about five million owners of farms. A million of new farms have been acquired since 1880. Many of the four million then in cultivation have since changed hands. Hundreds of thousands of these are owned by young men and others who have never before tilled lands of their own and who commenced husbandry with small means, little more than health, energy, and determination to succeed. Necessarily indebtedness has been incurred in many of these cases in purchasing old farms, in stocking old farms already paid for, or in fencing and building upon lands obtained from the Government under the homestead act. To such as commenced judiciously, with a full knowledge of the responsibilities involved, and with will and industry commensurate with the burden assumed, a mortgage may prove a blessing. It represents capital, without which the business of farming can not be undertaken or its products and profits be secured. It enables a poor but capable and industrious young man to secure a home and a profitable business, paying for it in easy installments; but it becomes a withering curse when it makes production dear and difficult, consumes a crop before it is made, and renders indebtedness hopeless.

Now, sir, I will give you something more that does come from "the Department of Agriculture," but it was not given by the figure-maker that got up the bogus farm-mortgage table. Here is an extract from the last report of the Commissioner:

It is a matter of congratulation that the burden of debt is decreasing, and is, in fact, relatively less than it was ten years ago.

And again he says:

It is gratifying to know that the burden is decreasing. The element of time in eliminating debts of pioneer settlement and improvement is obvious, for a large portion of American farmers have settled with little capital, and have erected houses and barns, built fences, dug ditches, felled forests, or broken prairies by the labor of their own hands. The capital in agriculture is of recent creation, much the largest portion from the labor of a single generation of workers.

The inducement to improve and stock a farm on the basis of free land is sufficient to warrant incurring indebtedness on the security of youth, and will, and muscle; and the gradual reduction of the debt, while the property is increasing in value, is a security of ultimate removal of the burden.

Mr. Chairman, I have more interest in the happiness and prosperity of the farmers of my State, and especially of my district, than has any free-trader living out of Iowa. My business interests and my political interests are linked to the welfare of the farmers of Iowa. If I believed that protection was injuring them I would oppose it if every man in this House were against me.

In addition to that I spent the early years of my life on a farm. From the time that I was six years old until I entered my twenty-second year I toiled early and late on a farm. That was from 1846 to 1861—a period within which Democracy and its leading doctrine, free trade, gave the world the strongest test of the unwisdom of both.

I remember how the farmer had to toil like a galley-slave during that period. I remember the good crops, but the starvation prices, of that period. I recall the poor and dear clothing of that period. I remember the oppressive "store bills" of that period. I remember the bad money, bad politics, bad teachings, bad laws, bad tariff, bad mortgages, and bad everything of that period of Democratic supremacy.

You could tell the difference between an audience made up of farmers and their wives and children on the Fourth of July in those "dear" old Democratic days and an audience of "city folks," as we used to call them. You can not detect that difference to-day.

The "log cabin" has disappeared. Comfortable homes, a good carpeted room, a spring wagon, a barn, a buggy or carriage for the trip to church or the town, a country paper, and often a good daily, books, plenty to eat and wear; these are the fruits of protection that the farmer enjoys to-day. This is the rule in the great Northwest, and pinching poverty is the exception.

THE FARMER'S MARKET.

That market is best for the farmer which will enable him to get the most possible for his products after deducting the transportation charges for getting his produce to the market. Clearly, then, the nearer the market is to him the better, because it costs less to reach it.

The free-trader urges the foreign market as the farmer's heaven; the protectionist the near and home market as the better one for the farmer, for several reasons:

First. It is near by and costs less for transportation, both in sending what he sells and in receiving what he buys.

Second. Because it is a steadier, more reliable market. Our own people are here and depend on our own farmers for their food.

Third. Because our farmers buy what they use from the non-farmer class and the latter buys his food from the farmer.

It is "help me and I will help you, and we are always here to help each other, and no go-between or outside raiders shall rob the other of the regular and reliable patronage which insures the happiness of both."

Why are the farming lands of Iowa becoming so valuable? Why are the lands that were worth $1.25 and $2.50 an acre in 1850 now worth $25 and $50 per acre and, in the vicinity of cities, from $100 to $250 per acre? It is because consumers who are not farmers are settling near to our farms.

I represent one of the most prosperous farming districts in the West. Why is it so?

It is because it has in it 102 cities and towns, with 592 manufacturing establishments of different kinds, employing 7,190 workmen, and supporting 28,760 people who are constant consumers of the produce of my farmers.

There are in my district foundries, plow manufactories, sash and door factories, oil mills, paint mills, wagon factories, carriage factories, oatmeal mills, flouring mills, creameries, railroad machine-shops, boot and shoe factories, clothing factories, pump factories, paper mills, pork-packing establishments, canning companies, barb-wire factories, pottery works, sorghum mills, woolen mills, windmills and tanks, cabinet-makers, spring-bed and mattress makers, harness, saddles, etc., coffin manufacturers, street-car makers, churn factories, builders of steamboats and steel hulls.

We ship wagons and carriages East and West, sending car-loads into California, Texas, and even into Mexico. We send omnibuses made in the city of Waterloo to the large cities of the East, and we ride in street-cars made by our own people. When we visit our Northern lakes we ride in floating palaces made by the cunning hands of our workmen. Nothing pleases our farmers more than to see manufacturing establishments going up in the cities or towns near by. Why? Because they bring more consumers near to them.

Every smoke-stack that marks the presence of a manufacturing house is a guaranty to the farmer that his market is getting surer and better.

Let the great manufacturing princes of the Old World come here, as the free-trade Democracy invite, and supply the American market, thus throwing out of employment American cash and American workmen, and what must be the result? Our home market will be gone, and those unemployed will be driven into agriculture, increasing the competition which the farmer does not want and which must cut down his present profits.

My people are not interested in having more farmers. They want more manufacturing establishments. They have food for you of the East and for you of the West who are not food raisers, and the farmer's real interest lies in your people being able to buy their food and to have money enough to pay good prices for it.

If we can keep the non-agriculturists at work they can take all our food. In 1887 the farm products amounted to over $5,000,000,000, while only $500,000,000 was exported to other lands—only about 10 per cent. of all produced. Ninety dollars of each $100 is eaten by our own people. With these facts before us why spend time dreaming of the far-away and unreliable markets in other countries?

It is a pleasure to know that the steadily declining cost of transportation is bringing our American producers and consumers more closely together, as will be demonstrated by the following table of transportation rates, whereby it will be seen that the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Chicago to the New York market has fallen from 42.60 cents in 1868 to 16.33 cents in 1887. The competition between transportation lines, the vigilance of Federal and State Legislatures, watched and stimulated by a thinking people, added to the growth of business, are rapidly removing the farmer's greatest trouble—expensive transportation for freights.

The following table gives the average freight charges per bushel for the transportation of wheat from Chicago to New York from 1868 to 1887. This table has been compiled by the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department:

FLAX AND LINSEED OIL.

Here are two things in which the farmers of the Northwest are vitally interested.

We have now 81 linseed-oil mills at work. They are located as follows:

Ohio	21	Wisconsin	3
Illinois	12	Kansas	2
Iowa	11	Nebraska	1
Pennsylvania	8	Michigan	1
Indiana	7	Dakota	1
New York	7
Missouri	4	Total	81
Minnesota	3

In these plants is invested over $5,000,000. They are capable of consuming the entire flax crop of this country—a crop that is annually growing larger.

The flaxseed last year aggregated about 12,000,000 bushels. In 1886 it was about 11,000,000 bushels. It is worth about $1 a bushel, so that the value of the crop last year to the farmers of the country was about $12,000,000. This industry meets sharp competition from Russia and British India, where it can be cheaply raised on account of the low prices paid to labor in those countries.

The Mills bill substantially leaves this industry unprotected. Withdraw the present protection and you will, first, destroy an annual crop aggregating $12,000,000; second, destroy $5,000,000 invested in oil mills; third, cut us off from the use of the linseed-oil meal now extensively used by farmers and graziers for feeding their stock; fourth, and, finally, many men now employed in this industry will be thrown out of employment.

The development of this industry in the West has reduced the prices of linseed oil and of flax products more than one-half, the direct result of our present protective duty on the same.

A short time ago the general value of linseed oil at the mills was from 80 cents to $1; the price now ranges from 36 cents to 55 cents.

The duty has given a high price to the farmers for the flaxseed and a lower price to the consumer for the oil.

Let the so-called "tariff reformers" have their way in this and the farmers of the Northwest will be robbed annually of $12,000,000, while Russia and British India would enjoy a monopoly of linseed culture and Great Britain would have a monopoly of the linseed-oil making of the world, all resulting in increased prices for linseed oil and the meal from the same.

If all this is wisdom and statesmanship, protect the farmer and the laborer from both.

WOOL.

A few words, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of wool.

Iowa is not a wool-growing State. In 1880 we had but 455,359 sheep in the State, being less than in 1870 by some 400,000 head. In passing, however, I note the fact that from the 855,359 which we had in 1870 we produced but 2,967,043 pounds of wool, while in 1880 we produced from the 455,359 head an aggregate of 2,971,975 pounds, showing an increased production in spite of a decrease in numbers.

We are not, as a State, specially interested in protecting this industry, and yet our interests as a part of this country clearly are with the protection and encouragement of the farmer who is engaged in sheep-raising and wool-growing. I can not limit the application of protection to the waters of the Mississippi and the Missouri, nor to the State lines of Minnesota and Missouri. My duty is to stand by the farmers of the United States.

Farmer LA FOLLETTE is raising wool in Wisconsin, just over the river from Farmer HENDERSON, who is raising pork. Should the former insist upon taking the duties off the swine products and the latter insist on taking the duties off the sheep products? No, sir. Our unit of thought is the United States; protection is right for all our industries that have capacity to meet our wants, and I will stand by the wool-growers of Ohio, Wisconsin, Texas, and other States on the same high and yet selfish principle that I ask them to stand by the farmers of Iowa. This is not an industry to be deserted.

In the last twelve years the total number of sheep has increased 10,975,914, or 32 per cent., in spite of the backset given a few years ago by reducing the tariff duty, and which was followed by evidence of the danger of such a course. We have now over 44,759,314 sheep in the United States. According to the statistician of the Treasury Department, we produced wool in this country as follows:

	Pounds.
1865	155,000,000
1875	192,000,000
1880	240,000,000
1886	285,000,000

We have not the values for 1865, but the other years are as follows:

1875	$94,320,652
1880	90,230,537
1886	68,400,000

These values warn us that this industry is not in a condition for the free-trade knife.

The values of the wool manufactures should be noted:

1850	$43,207,545
1860	65,596,364
1870	177,495,689
1880	267,252,913

The Department well adds that—

An examination of the totals above given will confirm the indications of the rapid development and the increasing interest of the people in the production of wool and in its manufacture.

When we consider in connection with the foregoing facts that we have invested in this business $159,091,869 as capital, employing at work an army of 161,557 people, paying out annually in wages $47,389,087, and feeding with these wages over 647,228 people, I am not prepared to strike at the wool industry.

Then, sir, let it not be forgotten that in addition to all of these national advantages from this one industry we find the cost of woolen goods gradually falling, so that we can buy our woolen clothing for less than we paid in 1861, before we gave wool real protection, and I for one can see my plain duty—a duty that I will find pleasure in performing—when I stand by the sheep-raising, wool-producing farmers of the United States.

I have taken pains to ascertain the sentiment of my own people on this subject, and I can say to the wool-growers of Ohio, California, Texas, and other States, no matter who may desert you the farmers of Iowa will not.

I read an extract from a letter from Hon J. M. Brayton, of Delhi, Delaware County, Iowa, who devotes his time to farming.

Under date of April 11, 1888, he says:

The sentiment here is to keep the tariff on wool. Few here keep sheep, but they like the tariff for the good of the farmer's cause. It aids agriculture to benefit any branch of it.

IS THE DUTY ADDED TO THE COST?

This is the point that is pressed by the free-traders more than any other. One J. S. Moore has been writing letters specially on this subject for Western consumption, and his letters have been published, I think, in every Democratic and free-trade paper in the West. He makes a long list of the articles under a startling heading something like this: "What the farmers pay under protection." Some papers change the heading and it reads, "Republican robberies of the farmer." This man Moore picks out all the items that are on the dutiable list, and in which farmers are in any way interested, places the rate of duty opposite, and the amount of duty is claimed to be the amount that is levied upon the farmer and that he must pay in addition to the original value of the article. It is the old free-trade claim, a thousand times completely refuted, that the duty is always added to the cost of the article to the consumer. It makes no difference what the article is selling for; it may be selling for less than the rate of duty, even, or within a trifle of that rate, the charge is made just as vigorously.

Take it in cases where, under the fostering care of a tariff duty we have developed an industry until we not only supply our own wants, but supply other countries, and, by sharp home competition, we have brought down the prices (as in the ordinary dishes used by our people) far below what the prices were before the duty was imposed. Still, Mr. Moore and all his clan keep right on telling the farmers that the tariff duty is added to the price of such articles.

Now, the very students in my State know better than this, and I can assure Mr. Moore and all other agents of the Cobden Club that the farmers of this country have intelligence and read and think for themselves, and are quite capable of understanding these false and foolish statements. I said that the students of my State know better than this. In a paper called The Citizen, published in my district, at Iowa Falls, in the issue of February 4, 1888, appears an article by "Student," in which communication this question is considered and its absurdities demonstrated. Then he takes Mr. Moore and his class on their own ground, as follows:

Now our free-trade or low-tariff friends insist that the tariff is a tax, and is so much added to the price of the article bought. Assuming this proposition to be true, let us look at it from the standpoint of the farmer's interest. Of course if the duty is so much added to the price, then the farmer receives for his product just that amount more than he would receive if he were not protected by a tariff against the imported article.

Then "Student" takes up the duties on farm products and illustrates his position as was done the other day in this House by Judge PERKINS, of Kansas, whose table of computations I adopt in the place of "Student's," as it is much more complete.

Here it is:

Table showing the amount of the leading farm products of the United States and the profit resulting to farmers from the application of this rule, which must apply to farm products as well as to manufactured articles.

It will be seen that if Mr. J. S. Moore is correct in his reasoning the farmers may be happy, for the application of this absurd doctrine as stated by Mr. Moore would give the farmers of this country annually the sum of $1,203,954,994 more than they would receive but for the tariff duties on the articles produced by them.

Perhaps allowance should be made for Moore, as he probably wrote his article above referred to just after one of the "costly dinners" referred to in this item:

J. S. Moore, the "Parsee Merchant," or rather, we may say, the agent of the free-trade foreign importers of New York, appears to be well cared for by his employers, if one may judge by the costly dinners, with unlimited champagne and other luxuries, with which he entertains the free-trade members of the Ways and Means Committee in Washington.—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

I will conclude this branch of the discussion on my part by quoting the language of Hon. Thomas H. Dudley in a speech delivered by him at a meeting of the Farmers' Congress held at Chicago November 11 last. Mr. Dudley formerly represented this Government as our consul at Liverpool, England. He is a man of learning and of high standing, whose facts are taken from the best official sources.

Here is what he said in reply to the question:

DOES PROTECTION INCREASE THE PRICE OF PROTECTED GOODS?

But there are those who say that protection increases the price of the protected goods, and that the people have to pay the difference between the low price the goods would be if not protected and the high price they bring when protected, and that the farmer and everybody else suffer to this extent, and they argue that the amount of protection placed upon a commodity represents the increased price to the purchaser. This is not true. The history of protection in our country shows directly the reverse of this.

It shows that upon all commodities such as tea, coffee, and spices, which we do not grow or produce in this country, the duty when imposed increases the price to the extent of the duty; but in no case has protection permanently increased the price upon commodities manufactured or produced here. The skill of our workmen, the machinery we use, and domestic competition have in every instance, as soon as the industry has been established, come in and reduced the price rather than increased it.

Let us look at the effect of protection upon the prices of articles manufactured in this country. An examination will show that there is not a single manufactured commodity, so far as I know, that is not cheaper to-day in the United States under our protective system than it was in 1860 under free trade and before the present protective tariff went into operation. Crockery-ware is 57 per cent. cheaper than it was in 1860; cotton goods are at least 25 per cent. less; and woolen goods, including dress goods and carpets, from 20 to 25 per cent. less. Silk goods, taking them on an average, are from 35 to 40 per cent. cheaper than they were in 1860, and so are all other kinds of textile goods. Iron and steel products, including machinery, edge tools, hardware, farming implements, tools, etc., and household goods, furniture, etc., are also much cheaper than they were in 1860.

Our present protective system commenced in 1861. The manufacture of steel rails in this country began in 1867. England was charging us at that time for steel rails over $150 per ton, and the duty imposed by us was 45 per cent. ad valorem. In 1871 the duty was changed from 45 per cent. ad valorem to a specific duty of $28 per ton, and in 1872 steel rails were selling for $112 per ton. In 1874, two years after this, steel rails were selling for $94.25 per ton; in 1876, two years later, they were selling for $59.25 per ton, and in 1885, nine years later, they sold as low as $27 per ton.

Previous to 1860 the duty on earthenware was 24 per cent. The pottery industry in this county at that time was substantially unknown, and England supplied us with nearly all the pottery we used. England had at that time no competition, and fixed her own prices, and the peple of this country had to pay them. The protective tariff raised the duty to 40 per cent., and it has since been still further increased to 55 per cent. Under these duties this industry sprung into existence, and it has grown to such an extent that now our home manufacturers are making two-thirds of all the crockery used in the country. Our home competition has forced down the price in England as well as in this country, and now you can buy as much crockery here for $2.50 as you could in 1860 for $4, and many descriptions are actually cheaper and are selling here for a less price than they are sold for in England.

While residing in Liverpool I ordered a watch from one of the makers in that city, for which he charged me 40 guineas, or $200 in our money. After I came home I bought the watch I now carry in this country, for which I paid $60. It is a far better watch than the one I bought in Liverpool, and more satisfactory in every way. The duty at that time was, and now is, 25 per cent. on watches, and, as we shall hereafter see, we are now exporting our watches and clocks to England.

By our present protective tariff on the lowest grades of unbleached cotton cloths there is a duty of 2½ cents per square yard; on bleached, 3½ cents; and on colored prints, 4½ cents, with a corresponding higher rate on the higher grades of cotton goods. Will any one assert that these duties have increased the price or in any way added one cent to the cost of cotton goods in the United States?

The manufacturers of this class of goods in this country are selling some descriptions of their goods at prices as low as the duty which is imposed by the law upon them, and, as we shall hereafter see, we are exporting our cotton goods to England and selling them in the markets there in open competition with the English manufacturers. In none of these cases has the duty increased the price; on the contrary, it has not only lowered the price, but it has forced the English manufacturer to reduce his price as well, a step he would never have taken so long as he had the monopoly of our market and could fix his own price for his commodities.

THE LABORER.

The laborer, like the farmer, is deeply interested in maintaining a sound protective-tariff system, and, above all, that it shall be stable, so that he may not suffer from fluctuating, uncertain, and falling prices for his labor.

The threatening attitude of the Democratic party towards the now well-recognized American policy of protection has, in my opinion, cost the laborers of this country untold millions of dollars.

I warn the laboring men against any party, any President, and any lawmaker whose influence and acts will quicken the manufacturing and industrial bee-hives of Great Britain and continental Europe, while in a corresponding degree it checks, hinders, and retards the capital and the manufacturing engines of your own country. It must be remembered that every dollar that is sent from this country to the laborers of Europe must come from the pockets of our own workingmen.

Some furnish figures to prove to laboring men, and including those who come from the old countries, that their condition is better here than it is abroad. I will not insult the intelligence of any laboring man by offering such proof, though plenty of it is at hand.

Every man, woman, and child born abroad and now here knows absolutely that their conditions are better here in every way, and they also know that their conditions have improved vastly since 1862, when the protective policy was really and honestly and fearlessly inaugurated and enforced in this country.

I do not claim that protection creates all of the happier conditions here found, but so far as human happiness can be promoted by calling out all the inventive, working, creating, and pushing powers of a people, there protection has been active, potential, and unceasing in giving these results to the laboring men of this Union.

Here is an unwilling witness as to the poor man's chances in this country. I quote from Mr. Matthew Arnold, who, after making a close study of this country, went back to England to scold us wherever he could find the smallest pretext. In his paper in the Nineteenth Century he says:

For that immense class of people, the great bulk of the community, the class of people whose income is less than three or four hundred a year, things in America are favorable. It is easier for them there than in the Old World to rise and to make their fortune; but I am not now speaking of that. Even without making their fortune, even with their income below three or four hundred a year, things are favorable to them in America; society seems organized there for their benefit. To begin with, the humbler kind of work is better paid in America than with us; the higher kind, worse. The official, for instance, gets less; his office-keeper gets more.

The public ways are abominably cut up by rails and blocked by horse-cars; but the inconvenience is for those who use private carriages and cabs; the convenience is for the bulk of the community, who but for the horse-cars would have to walk. The ordinary railway-cars are not delightful, but they are cheap, but they are better furnished, and in winter are warmer than third-class carriages in England. Luxuries are, as I have said, very dear, above all European luxuries; but a workingman's clothing is nearly as cheap as in England, and plain food is, on the whole, cheaper. Even luxuries of a certain kind are within a laboring man's easy reach.

Whatever Mr. Arnold has said unjustly of this country I will not stop by his new-made grave to notice, but I will pause here to thank him for these words of solid truth in behalf of America and her treatment of her sons of toil.

WAR TAXES.

The enemies of American industries are trying in every way possible to prejudice the public mind against our tariff laws, and one of the favorite methods is to speak of our whole fiscal system for raising money to run the Government as "the old war-tax system." With the coolness that should shame an iceberg for lack of influence they denounce our present system of taxation as "war tax," and there are many honest people who are misled by this oft repeated cry.

It is an absolutely false charge, and can only be supported by "brass," ignorance, or falsehood—certainly not by truth.

The "war taxes" touched almost every industry of the country, as of necessity they had to. But no sooner had the current war expenses ended than the Republican party commenced to cut down taxation, and in every possible way to relieve the people. It lifted the burden from all the hundreds of things taxed by the internal-revenue laws until four things—spirits, beer, and tobacco, and national banks—alone remained taxed. It was cut right and left, reducing the revenue and the internal revenue, keeping wise pace with our changing conditions.

But what it has done and what the Democratic party has done is so well told by the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means in their minority report that I submit that part of it here as an unanswerable refutation of the stale cry of "war taxes."

Here are the two records as given by the Republican minority.

WHAT REDUCTIONS HAVE TAKEN PLACE.

It is a striking fact that all of the reductions of taxation which have occurred since the conclusion of the war, with the exception of the trifling ones made by the acts of March 1, 1879, and of May 20, 1880, aggregating a little over $6,000,000, were accomplished while the party now in the minority was in the majority and in control of legislation.

A brief summary of what has been done in this regard will be both suggestive and instructive.

By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction of the revenue from customs duties was:

Free list	$2,403,000
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	23,651,748
Total	26,054,748

By the act of May 1, 1872, tea and coffee were placed upon the free-list, making a reduction of $15,893,847

By the act of June 6, 1872, tariff duties were further reduced, and the reduction by the—

Free-list	$3,345,724
Estimated deduction from the dutiable list	11,933,191
Total	15,278,915

By the act of March 3, 1883, from tariff:

Free-list	$1,365,999
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	19,489,800
Total	20,855,799

The foregoing estimates were made when the several bills were passed.

Of internal taxes the following have been the reductions made by the party now in the minority since the conclusion of the war:

By the acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867	$103,381,199
By the acts of March 31, 1868, and February 3, 1868	54,802,578
By the act of July 14, 1870	55,315,321
By the act of December 21, 1871	14,436,862
By the act of June 6, 1872	15,807,618
By the act of March 3, 1883	40,677,682
Total	284,421,260

This we present as the result of Republican legislation from July 13, 1866, down to and including March 3, 1883.

The Republican party was in control of the House of Representatives from the first-named date to March 4, 1875. During that period it will be observed that taxation was reduced and revenue diminished in the aggregate sum of $284,421,260. On the 4th of March, 1875, the control of the House passed to the Democratic party and remained with it until the 4th day of March, 1881, a period of six years. During these years the internal revenue was reduced $6,368,935. On the 4th day of March, 1881, the Republican party was reinvested with control of the House of Representatives, holding it for two years, during which time it reduced taxation and the revenues from customs sources in the estimated sum, $20,855,793, and upon internal revenue, $40,677,682, a grand total of $61,432,481.

Since the 4th day of March, 1883, the House of Representatives has been dominated by the present majority party, a period of five years, and no taxes have been reduced and no curtailment of the revenues has taken place, although warned of a threatened surplus not only by the present Administration, but by the preceding one of President Arthur. It will be observed that from 1866 to 1888, a period of twenty-two years, the control of the House of Representatives has been equally divided between the two political parties, each having eleven years.

During the eleven years of Republican control the revenues were reduced (estimated)	$362,504,569
During the eleven years of Democratic control the revenues were reduced	6,368,935
Difference in favor of the present minority party in the House of	356,135,634

If it be claimed that for the most part during the Democratic control of the House the Senate was dominated by the Republican party, and therefore the responsibility of failure to reduce the revenues should be alike shared by them, we answer, that under the Constitution of the United States the House alone can originate bills to reduce taxation, the Senate having no jurisdiction of the subject until it is given to it by a bill which passes the House, and that during all these years no such bill has gone from the House to the Senate, and therefore the sole responsibility for failure rests with the present majority in the House of Representatives.

If disaster results from the failure of the President to use the surplus now in the Treasury, as the law authorizes him to use it, in payment of our existing debts, and if the majority in the House, which alone can originate a bill to reduce the revenue, fails to send to the Senate a bill of that character, the responsibility will rest with them. The minority are powerless; they are neither in control of the House nor the committees; they are in no parliamentary position to report a bill or give direction to legislation which shall surely accomplish results so much desired.

They sought by amendments in the Committee on Ways and Means to make this bill reasonable, just, and practical; failing there, they will seek to amend and modify it in the Committee of the Whole House, and if their efforts there are unavailing, they will seek as a last resort an opportunity to offer a substitute, which will assuredly diminish the revenues without any impairment of the American system of protection.

It is therefore manifest that the responsibility for the present monetary condition which so alarms the country does not rest with the minority party in the House, but with the President and the majority in Congress. They can not escape it. The President has for three years failed, while having the power, to avoid the financial condition he now complains of. The majority in the House for six years has signally failed to provide for a reduction of the revenue. They can not avoid responsibility for the evils which are now upon us, and while these are beyond their power to retrieve, they can, by courage and wisdom, and governed by business principles, provide against like evils in the future. They must now act or make public confession of failure.

The minority regard this bill not as a revenue-reduction measure, but as a direct attempt to fasten upon this country the British policy of free foreign trade. So viewing it, their sense of obligation to the people, and especially the working people, employed in manufacturing and agriculture in all sections of our common country, impels them to resist it with all their power.

They will assist the majority in every effort to reduce the redundant income of the Government in a direct and practicable way, but every effort at fiscal legislation which will destroy or enfeeble our industries, retard material development, or tend to reduce our labor to the standard of other countries will be met with the persistent and determined opposition of the minority represented in the House.

J. C. BURROWS.

It must also be kept in mind that while the war expenses have ceased accumulating, the great burdens left us by the war are still here and will press upon us for many years yet to come—as, for instance, the pension list, now aggregating $80,000,000 annually, and likely to be increased for some years to come.

And again, our annual interest account of $40,000,000, to which must be added due provision for paying the immense bonded debt of the nation when it matures. Here, then, is an annual charge of $120,000,000, which must be met in addition to the regular current expenses of our great and growing country.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

Mr. Chairman, I have touched upon as many features of this question as my limited time would permit. I am aware that no law can be so framed as to work absolute justice to all, and legislation so comprehensive and far reaching as our tariff laws can not be made so that all criticism can be avoided. The most perfect work of to-day may, through changing conditions, demand a change in the future. One thing, however, can not be denied, and that is that our tariff system since 1861 has worked grand results for all our people, and has commanded the approving comments from the wisest statesmen of our own country and of foreign lands.

The destruction of a fiscal policy so fruitful of happiness and general prosperity to our people should not be thought of now; and before any radical changes are attempted, it should be demonstrated that good and not evil results would follow.

Let us apply our legislative powers with caution, with wisdom, and with an eye to the good of the whole country.

Let partisanship disappear in patriotism. Where we must yield a little for a locality let it be because we aim for the general good, forgetting not that each State is a link in a great chain, and that he who depends upon the chain cannot afford to destroy the power of a single link.

We can not turn a deaf ear to the thousands of lumbermen who appeal to us from Maine to California; we should not forget the weaver of Massachusetts, the spinner of Rhode Island, the cotton picker of South Carolina, the ranchman of Texas, the farmer of Iowa, the toiler in the shop, or the cowboy on the western plains.

The great advantage that comes from our "Union of States" is to be found in perfect confidence and fairness towards each other, in perfect free trade between the States, and in our absolute ability to prevent any outside power from destroying the Republic by the use of arms or by plundering the rich markets that belong to our own people. [Loud applause.]

During the delivery of the remarks of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, when one hour had expired, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be sufficiently extended to enable him to complete his remarks.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think ten minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. BLAND. I do not object to this extension of time, as there has already to-day been an extension of half an hour to another gentleman. I will merely say that, in view of the lateness of the hour, I do not propose to proceed with my remarks this evening, but will defer what I have to say.

Mr. BAYNE. I want my friend from Iowa to have this extension; but I would like to have it understood that these extensions of time are not to be taken out of the hours set apart for the discussion of this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate having been limited by the House——

Mr. MCMILLIN. What was the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAYNE. That these extensions of time shall not be taken out of the hours allotted to this debate, but shall be regarded as a courtesy extended to the individual members.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was extended for half an hour. While I do not object to the extensions now asked, I do not care to follow at so late an hour this evening, and therefore have made the announcement that I do not propose to proceed with my remarks to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to granting the extension asked?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to claim that these extensions should not be charged to the side to which they are granted?

Mr. BAYNE. I think they should not be charged to the hours allotted for this debate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman object to the extension?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not. I hope extensions will be given on both sides; but I do not want this time to be taken out of the hours allotted for general debate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman from Iowa, but I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not place such restrictions upon the request as will make its granting impossible.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the ruling of the Chair upon the point?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not beyond the power of the Committee of the Whole to make any agreement which will change the order determined upon by the House? We can not extend the time beyond the seventeen days.

Mr. BAYNE. We are in Committee of the Whole, and the committee can sit a little later if need be, in order to afford opportunity for these extensions.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I shall object to any extension of time if it involves an extension of the seventeen days allowed for general debate.

A MEMBER. Nobody is asking that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think these extensions ought to be charged against the side to which they are granted. That is certainly fair; I think no one should object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the time for general debate on this bill has been limited to a certain number of days. When those days have been occupied the general debate will be closed. It is immaterial, so far as the aggregate time is concerned, who occupies the time. The Chair, however, will endeavor to divide the time equally between those opposing the bill and those favoring it, and when the time for general debate shall have expired that fact will be announced by the Chair. The Chair desires further to state that to-day the committee will rise at half past 5 o'clock, and there will be no evening session.

Mr. WEBER. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has notified the House that he does not wish to proceed this evening, I would like to know whether the hour of which the gentleman neglects to avail himself will be charged to that side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to accommodate both sides of the House, so far as the time is concerned. When the gentleman from Iowa has concluded, the Chair will recognize any gentleman that desires to proceed this evening. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] wishes to be recognized, and is ready to proceed. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] be permitted to conclude his remarks? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, resumed and concluded his remarks, as already given.

Mr. GALLINGER:

> They wired in and wired out,
> And left the looker-on in doubt,
> Whether the snakes which made the track
> Were going South or coming back.

That is the record, Mr. Chairman, of the Democratic party on the tariff question. [Laughter.] Following the advice of the apostle, given, however, in a better cause, they have been literally "all things to all men." But after more than a quarter of a century of shilly-shallying and double dealing, the mask has been thrown off, and through their President and Secretary of the Treasury the principle of protection has been denounced and practical free trade indorsed. The President talks glibly of the "vicious, inequitable, and illogical" features of the tariff laws, and the Secretary of the Treasury gravely advises that as many additional articles as possible be added to the free-list. The issues are drawn, and the contest between protection and so-called revenue reform is inaugurated.

The immediate occasion of this outburst of anti-American doctrine is the fact that, under the operation of existing laws, the obligations of the Government have been met, and a large surplus has accumulated in the Treasury. Somehow the Democratic party has always seemed to prefer a deficit to a surplus, at least they have usually managed, when in power, to empty the Treasury. When the Republican party assumed control of the Government in 1860 the problem of a deficit confronted Congress, and when the Democratic party regained power in 1884 they were confronted with an entirely different problem, that of managing a large surplus. It will be remembered that in 1860, on the very eve of a gigantic rebellion, the Treasury was absolutely bankrupt, the bonds of the Government selling at 85 and money being borrowed at 12½ per cent. interest.

This condition of bankruptcy was the natural and inevitable outcome of the Calhoun free-trade policy of the Southern States, and the general mismanagement of governmental affairs by the Democratic party. The Southern States then, as now, dominated the Democracy. They were and are now consumers, not producers, and they enacted laws which would allow them to go into the markets of the world and buy goods where they were cheapest, without paying the duties to the United States which the Constitution authorizes may be levied and collected, and regardless of the effect of such legislation upon the manufacturing and laboring interests of our own country.

In 1837 a condition similar to that of 1860 existed, the Government being utterly unable to negotiate a loan of a few millions of dollars to meet its requirements, which were so urgent that at times there was not money enough in the Treasury to pay the salary of the President. This condition of things continued until 1842, when a so-called high tariff law was passed. A change for the better immediately ensued, which became so manifest as to justify President Tyler, in December, 1844, saying to the country:

> The credit of the Government has been thoroughly restored. Its coffers, which for a season were empty, have been replenished. A currency nearly uniform in its value has taken the place of one depreciated and almost worthless. Commerce and manufactures, which had suffered in common with almost every other interest, have once more revived, and the whole country exhibits an aspect of prosperity and happiness.

But notwithstanding this marvelous change for the better, the Southern leaders in 1846 insisted upon the repeal of the tariff law of 1842. Almost immediately a decline was witnessed in our productive industries, which, according to Henry Carey Baird, of Philadelphia, a distinguished authority, is well illustrated by that of iron, the production of which fell from 800,000 tons in 1847 to 500,000 tons in 1852, while the total consumption of pig-iron, domestic and foreign, which was, in 1847, 87.7 pounds per capita, declined, in 1852, to 53.5 pounds. At the same time a fearful condition of financial distress overtook the nation, the rate of interest advancing so rapidly that individuals and houses of the highest credit were obliged to pay as high as 2 per cent. per month for the use of money.

This condition of things, to a greater or less extent, continued until the accession of the Republicans to power in 1860. This party, by its wise financial legislation, raised money with which to prosecute a long and bloody war, and resumed specie payments long before any Democratic statesman thought it possible to do so. It also wiped out the national debt at a rate which challenged the admiration of foreign financiers, and gave to the Democratic party, when it resumed power in 1884, an overflowing treasury, with bonds greatly above par, and the debt of the Government carrying a much lower rate of interest than was ever known in the history of the country.

The fact is that with the exception of the years from 1824 to 1833, and from 1842 to 1846, thirteen in all, the Democratic doctrine of "tariff for revenue only" practically dominated the country from the inauguration of the Government to the breaking out of the rebellion. And it is a matter of history that the results of this policy brought about constantly recurring seasons of ruin to the people and their industries, the currency during all these years being neither sufficient in quantity nor good in quality. Indeed, so great, so almost universal were these seasons of disaster that the history of almost every productive industry in the country is a record of ruined farms, factories, workshops, and mines, of misery, wretchedness, and demoralization, of wrecked fortunes and shattered hopes.

And yet in the very face of these lessons the Democratic party to-day, backed by all the power of the Federal Administration, is here to strike a deadly blow at the present industrial prosperity of the United States, and this Congress is expected to crystalize into law the behests of the White House and the Treasury Department in that direction.

The majority of the Ways and Means Committee have brought into this House a measure the title of which is "A bill to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue." The title of the bill might properly be changed to that of "A bill to reduce New England to the condition of a dependency of Great Britain." for whatever else this measure might do if enacted into law, it certainly would utterly wreck the industrial prosperity of the New England States.

With wool, timber, wood, boards, paper-pulp, needles, brick, many agricultural products, knives, pens, type-metal, house furniture and other manufactures of wood, cotton thread, cotton cloth, spool-thread, oil-cloths, gunny-cloth, bags and bagging, woolen and worsted cloth, flannels, blankets, knit goods, dress goods, wearing apparel, carpets and carpetings, paper, paper boxes, paper envelopes, bonnets, hats, card clothing, carriages, materials for hats, watches, and many other of the products of New England either on the free-list or the tariff greatly reduced thereon, it needs no spirit of prophecy to discern the utter demoralization of the manufacturing industries of the North, with consequent hardships to the workingmen and working-women who are earning comfortable wages in our shops and mills, and to our farmers, who find in the manufacturing centers a ready market for their products.

My only excuse for occupying a moment's time in this debate is that the interests of the section to which I belong are seriously threatened by the provisions of the bill under consideration. Living as I do on the banks of a stream which carries more spindles than any other river in the world—a river, too, which asks no appropriation from Congress, for its water is used to produce the wealth and comfort which come from busy communities and industrious artisans—I would be derelict alike to my own convictions and the welfare of my people did I remain silent while this important question is before the American Congress.

The message of the President and the bill of the committee are alike a challenge and a menace to the New England States. If the President's recommendations should be enacted into law, thriving villages will be depopulated and the hum of countless industries hushed. Where now are thrift and enterprise and prosperity—where happy homes and contented communities exist—will be ruin and sorrow and desolation. No language of mine can adequately portray the direful results of this contemplated legislation, and, as an humble representative of a New England district, I enter my solemn protest against it.

The Democratic party may think there are urgent political considerations demanding that this shall be done. But it is not so. The grand progress of this nation since the enactment of our tariff laws has been the marvel of the world, and it will be absolutely wicked and suicidal, in the very flush of that marvelous growth and prosperity, to change our laws so essentially as to open to Europe, with her poorly-paid labor, our magnificent and rapidly-increasing markets.

Mr. Chairman, the contest before us is a struggle between Europe and America, and the bill we are considering is a wicked and needless assault upon the industries of New England. I will not stop to repeat the trite arguments that sustain this view. I will not weary you with a lengthy repetition of the proofs that labor is better paid in America than elsewhere, or that our people enjoy infinitely more of the comforts and luxuries of life than any other people on the face of the earth. These things are well known, and the lesson they carry is so plain as not to require extended consideration.

I notice in this discussion that every speaker is an ardent friend of the laboring man and that both parties are extolled as being the special champions of labor interests. I am not posing in any direction. I believe that the interests of labor deserve and should receive national recognition. I believe that the wage-earner has a right to be heard in defense of his interests and that the doors of the Committee on Ways and Means should have been opened wide to him. In this matter of tariff revision he has as deep an interest as any other class, but it should not be forgotten that the men who have invested their money in business enterprises, who have built railroads, mills, and warehouses, have an equal right before the law, and that they, too, should have had easy access to the room where this iniquitous bill was framed.

The Republican party has made a record on the labor question. It passed laws which gave homes, without money and without price, to hundreds of thousands of American citizens. It fought the battle of freedom, and through its great leader, the immortal Lincoln, lifted a race from servitude and unpaid toil to manhood and citizenship. On this question the Republican party is impregnable and needs no defense. Recognizing tariff laws as absolutely indispensable if the rights of labor are to be protected, the Republican party stands unflinchingly in defense of that system, ready to join issue with any party which assails it. But the Republican party is equally firm in its defense of the business integrity of the country, and is united almost to a man in its opposition to the assault which this bill makes upon the manufacturing and financial interests of the Northern States.

It is a noteworthy fact that no other nation has prospered like the United States during the last quarter of a century. On this point the platitudes of doctrinaires must fall before the inexorable logic of fact. And I assert that our marvelous growth and phenomenal prosperity are largely due to the beneficent results of the policy of protection, inaugurated by the Republican party in the early years of its existence, and upheld and defended by that party ever since. Gladstone has alluded to our rapid growth and financial strength in glowing words, and this greatest of English statesmen doubtless knows the source of our prosperity, and also comprehends what is necessary to stop our progress.

England is a representative free-trade country, the United States a representative protection country. Sixteen billions of dollars was the sum total of our wealth in 1860, and one-half of that was wasted in the war. The wealth of England at that time was thirty billions, or nearly twice that of the United States. But notwithstanding the cost and devastation of a four years' war, our wealth is now over sixty billions, and that of England only a trifle more than forty billions. In 1860 our manufactures amounted to one billion eight hundred million dollars, while now they reach the vast amount of seven billions. Then we were the third manufacturing country in the world, while to-day we are the first, exceeding England by one-third.

Our farms have increased in number from two millions to five millions, and our wool product from sixty million pounds to three hundred million pounds. In that time we have increased our commerce eight times, while England has not quadrupled hers. Our railroads have grown from thirty thousand to nearly one hundred and fifty thousand miles, and the rolling stock of our railroads is worth nine times the merchant marine of England. In that time 55 per cent. of all the wealth added to the earth has been contributed by the United States. What a mighty result is that! In all human history nothing can be found to equal it, and yet we have croakers in Congress who are talking of the decay of our institutions. In England 51 per cent. of the wealth goes to pay labor, 26 per cent. to capital, and 23 per cent. to government, while in the United States labor gets 74 per cent., capital 21 per cent., and the Government 5 per cent.

Yet in the face of this fact we are asked to abandon the policy which has brought such marvelous prosperity to our people and adopt the economic theories and practices of Great Britain. Why should we do this? Why abandon a national policy which insures to labor a higher rate of wages than has ever been earned by man in any other country on the earth? I am aware that this is denied. If I mistake not, the denial has been made during the discussion of this bill; at least it has been claimed that the laboring men are no better off in this country than in Europe. This surely is not so. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MILLS] must be mistaken on this point, and the eloquent gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] must have allowed his zeal to blind his knowledge or he would not have asserted the same thing.

Facts go much farther on this point than glittering generalities. Take the matter of wages paid on the Clyde and the Delaware, and the figures show that American mechanics, in that line of work, get about twice the rate of wages that are paid abroad. Laboring men may well ponder the figures, and especially so this fall, when the choice will be presented to them between voting for a man who represents the protection idea of the Republican party and the man who issued the recent manifesto from the White House. Here are the figures:

Another table represents the average rate of wages paid in the flax-spinning trade in Europe and America, on the basis of sixty hours' work per week, although in some of the European countries they are required to work from seventy-two to eighty-one hours per week. This table shows that in some branches of this industry the United States pays its working men and women more than six times as much as they receive for the same labor in some European countries. And yet we are told by Democratic orators that laboring men are no better off here than in Europe. It is not true, and this table will help to show that it is not true:

	Prussia (Silesia).	Rhineland.	Germany.	Russia, Eastern.	Russia, Western.	France.	Great Britain.	United States.

The New York Press has recently compiled some wage figures, which can not fail to interest laboring men in this country. The statements in regard to the wages paid in England are taken from the latest returns made by the board of trade in London and other official documents for 1886. They give in every case the highest British wages according to free-trade authorities. The figures for the American side of the table come from fifty different sources, and have been compiled under the supervision of A. R. Whitney. American wage-earners, look in the right-hand column and then look in the left-hand column and decide which wages you would rather have. Remember also that official figures show that the cost of living is only 17 per cent. higher here than in England.

But what does it profit a man if he does gain 17 cents per day by reduced cost of living and at the same time loses at least $1 per day in wages?

The following table gives the weekly wages in England and the United States of laborers and mechanics in different branches of industry:

Next I give a table showing the average weekly rate of wages paid in woolen factories in the United States (Massachusetts), France (Rheims district), England (Yorkshire district), and Germany (Rhenish district). It is impossible to doubt the accuracy of this table, as Carroll D. Wright is responsible for the United States figures, ex-Consul Frisbie for those of France, Robert Giffen for the English, and ex-Consul Du Bois for those of Germany.

Occupation.	United States.	France.	England.	Germany.
Wood-sorters:
Men	$9.43	$5.82	$5.76	$5.50
Women	6.00	2.70	2.40	2.50
Young persons	5.12	2.00	1.80	1.90
Spinners:
Men (overseers)	12.00	6.50	6.00	6.00
Spinners	9.05	6.00	5.00	5.25
Women	6.18	3.00	3.60	3.00
Young persons	4.81	2.00	1.80	1.90
Piecers	5.00	3.00	2.50	2.40
Weavers:
Men	8.53	4.67	4.80	4.25
Women	7.45	4.00	3.48	4.10
Mechanics	13.40	6.25	5.50	5.00
Laborers	8.58	3.75	3.35	3.00

Thus it will be seen, according to official authority, that wages are 100 per cent. higher in the woolen and worsted industry in the United States than in any of the European countries. So long as this industry is adequately protected they can pay high wages. Reduce the duty and wages must be reduced proportionately. Abolish the duty and wages must ultimately sink to the European standard, or the industries must migrate to European countries.

The appended table gives the relative actual cost of labor in a woolen mill of two hundred and twenty-one hands in Providence and of a similar mill in Bradford, England, according to Mr. Charles Fletcher:

	Providence.		Bradford.
	Per week.	Total.	Per week.	Total.
Forty-five small boys and girls, fourteen years old	$3.29	$146.25	$1.50	$67.50
One hundred and four small boys and girls, eighteen years old	5.25	546.00	2.50	260.00
Fifty boys and girls, twenty-one years old	6.00	300.00	3.00	150.00
Six section hands	13.50	85.00	7.00	42.00
Two overseers	24.00	48.00	9.00	18.00
One Superintendent	36.00	36.00	15.00	15.00
One boss dyer	30.00	30.00	10.00	10.00
Eight laborers in dye-house	7.00	56.00	4.50	36.00
One watchman	14.00	14.00	6.00	6.00
Two machinists for repairs	15.00	30.00	7.50	15.00
Two clerks	15.00	30.00	7.00	14.00
Total cost of weekly pay-roll	.....	1,317.25	.....	633.50

107.93 per cent. in favor of Providence operatives.

Illustrations could be continued ad infinitum, but enough have been given to convince any reasonable man that, however anxious importers and Southern consumers may be to have the tariff laws emasculated, laboring men have a special interest in keeping them intact. In many industries 100 per cent. is below rather than above the difference between the wage lists of free-trade England and protection America, and hence every laboring man has a direct and personal interest in the issue raised by President Cleveland and the Democratic party.

The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], in his great speech delivered on the 23d instant, called attention to some of the joyful utterances of the British press over the prospective success of President Cleveland's anti-tariff programme. Volumes of other testimony could be given on that point. Recently a prominent member of the British Parliament enthusiastically exclaimed:

To convert the United States is indeed a triumph. The Cobden Club will henceforth set up a special shrine for the worship of President Cleveland and send him all its publications gratis. Cobden founded free trade; Cleveland saved it.

Such are the utterances of British statesmen, and that is the feast to which the Democratic party invites the people of this country. But before accepting the invitation let us ask some of these same British statesmen what free trade has done for the people of Great Britain.

Thomas Carlyle declared only a few years ago that—

British industrial existence seems fast becoming one huge poison-swamp of reckless pestilence—physical and moral—a hideous living Golgotha of souls and bodies buried alive. Thirty thousand outcast needle-women working themselves swiftly to death. Three million paupers rotting in forced idleness; and these are but items in the sad ledger of despair.

What a picture that is for American workingmen and women to contemplate, and what a feast is that to which free trade invites them?

Look at the great free-trade city of Birmingham, the home of Bright and Chamberlain, and compare the condition of its working people with those of our own Birmingham, in a Southern State, which will soon, in industrial self-defense, repudiate the economic doctrines of the Democratic party.

In a locality seven miles from that great city of Birmingham, sixteen thousand English women—wives, mothers, and daughters—toil by day and by night making nails and rivets. A writer in the London Standard speaks thus of their remuneration:

The remuneration they receive is incredibly small. It is no unusual thing, indeed it is the usual custom, for a family of three persons, after working fourteen hours a day, to earn $5 in a week, out of which scanty amount deductions are made for fuel, repairing machinery, etc., which makes the actual pay for three persons $4.18 per week, work commencing at half-past 7 in the morning and continuing all through the weary day until late at night, with no substantial food.

And another writer says:

These poor laborers rarely or never taste meat from one week's end to the other. The scenes of misery—misery so deep and dreadful that the most graphic pen can only faintly convey its depth of sorrow—that are witnessed in this region would hardly be believed in the United States.

Go to Leeds, England, and see the condition of the working people there, and then tell me, men of the South, do you want the laboring men of the United States reduced to their level? A few years ago the inspector of police in Leeds was asked if he knew of a single instance in that great industrial city of 320,000 souls where a workingman—a skilled artisan, mechanic, engineer, carpenter, or mason—owned the house in which he lived and the ground on which it stood, and the reply was: "If I was on my oath in court I should be obliged to answer no."

Now come with me to any New England town or city and see the homes of the mechanics and laboring men, homes of thrift and comfort and neatness, and then insist, if you will, that the laboring men in Europe are as well paid and as prosperous as they are in this country; but you must not expect to deceive intelligent workingmen by such false and misleading statements.

Neither the incident so dramatically related by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that Jay Gould and Vanderbilt under a high tariff do not pay their boot-blacks $500 for a "shine," nor the circumstance so pathetically detailed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] of a family in that State being driven from their home by the sheriff, notwithstanding the tariff laws, will specially affect the question of the workingman's interest in tariff legislation.

If the gentleman from Texas will take the trouble to look at free-trade England he will doubtless find many lords and dukes, owners of vast estates, who pay even less liberally for labor than Jay Gould, and if the gentleman from Indiana will direct his gaze for a moment to Ireland, that land where free trade and British greed have destroyed the linen and other industries which prospered under tariff laws, he will see evictions by wholesale of workingmen from their homes, and cruelties and hardships to the laboring classes compared to which his Indiana incident is of the slightest possible consequence. [Laughter.]

But, as I have already said, my purpose is to make a plea for New England—the section of the country where seamless stockings are made, where the machine which makes them was invented and is now being exclusively built, and where pretty much everything else that the ingenuity of man has devised is reproduced. My plea is that no legislation may be enacted by this Congress which will strike down her magnificent enterprises, cripple her great financial prosperity, and bring disaster and ruin to her industrious and enterprising citizens.

To enforce this plea comparisons will be made between New England and the Southern States, and the lesson that I would enforce is that the South should not drag New England down by hostile legislation, but rather that she, freed from the incubus of slavery, should imitate New England thrift and enterprise; should plant manufactures on her streams; should call forth from her soil the mineral wealth there hidden, and that the New South, forgetting the things of the past and pressing forward in the onward march of industrial art and enterprise, should become a worthy rival of the States for which I make my plea to-day. If in the discussion I seem to be enthusiastic over the prosperity and enterprise of my own section, I shall certainly endeavor not to be unfair toward the South, a section of the country which, to my mind, is one of great possibilities but neglected opportunities.

The estimated population of the United States to-day is 59,893,000. The estimated population of the six New England States is 4,449,300, less than one-thirteenth of the whole, while the estimated population of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee is 17,841,600, or more than four times that of New England. New England represents the doctrine of protection, and has adapted her business accordingly, while the South, through its representative men on this floor, still clings to its early free-trade heresies, and apparently desires to uproot the existing tariff laws, upon which the industries and prosperity of New England, alike with all other sections of the country, necessarily depend.

I am free to confess that the present agitation of the tariff question has alarmed New England manufacturers. Why should it not? I know it is fashionable for Democratic orators on this floor to denounce New England manufacturers as "robbers," "thieves," etc. But the men who talk thus have not taken the trouble to inform themselves regarding the innumerable wrecks of business enterprises that mark the history of manufacturing in New England, nor to mention the vast amount of capital invested in these enterprises.

That most of them are prosperous admits of no doubt; but surely that fact is not a sufficient cause for hostile and destructive legislation, for after all it is only from prosperous people that our revenues can be collected. Three hundred and twenty of the largest manufacturers in New England have sent a petition to Congress, which gives unanswerable reasons for opposing the fallacious plea for free raw materials. The petitioners represent the cotton, woolen, paper, carpet, hardware, boots and shoes, silk, worsted, lumber, hosiery, machinery, and nearly fifty other leading New England industries, and, as an influential New England journal says—

It would be hard to find a parallel to this paper as an expression of the position of the industrial forces of New England.

Probably this petition has not been read by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, but notwithstanding this, its expressions are those of experts who understand the practical workings of legislation affecting their interests, and as such they have a right to be heard. The petition points to the astounding fact that while the increase of free imports in twenty years has been from twenty-nine million dollars to two hundred and thirty-three millions, or about 700 per cent., the increase of dutiable imports in the same time has been only from three hundred and twenty-nine million dollars to four hundred and fifty millions, or 37 per cent.

Business men understand the significance of these figures, and naturally look with utter alarm upon any legislation which proposes to still further admit free foreign goods in competition with those of American manufacture. These petitioners claim that the principle of protection is national and not provincial, and that it is equally applicable to all the industries of the United States; that the American policy should benefit alike all citizens, whether engaged in agriculture, manufacturing, or mining, and that the interests of the country are interdependent and mutually sustaining, and the people of the different sections co-customers and co-consumers. That is the New England platform, and that is destined to be the platform of the South when her mines are developed, her mills constructed, and a home market thus supplied for her agricultural products.

I have suggested that probably this petition from these three hundred and twenty manufacturers of New England was not read by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means. I noticed yesterday an article in the last number of the North American Review, from the pen of a distinguished member of that committee [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas], in which he argues that no right was abridged by denying a hearing to these representatives of the manufacturing industries of the country, or to any other class, including, of course, the representatives of labor. He claims that the constitutional right of petition does not extend to matters before committees of the House. Surely this can not be so, because a committee of the House on the subject before it is for the time being the House, and all matters referred to it by the House should have the same treatment that the Constitution guaranties to the citizen in his relation to Congress. Any other construction practically nullifies the right of petition.

Under the rules of the House petitions are not read when presented, but are referred to the appropriate committees through the petition-box. Now, if committees can deny even the reading of such petitions as are referred to them, as the Committee on Ways and Means seems to have done, and also refuse to allow any man or body of men to make a statement to the committee, what becomes of the boasted right of petition guarantied by the Constitution? It becomes a myth and a mockery. The gentleman from Arkansas has made an ingenious plea, but he will not succeed in persuading the American people that their constitutional rights are safe in his hands, or in the hands of his Democratic associates on the Committee on Ways and Means. Had petitions been read and hearings allowed, the chairman of the committee would doubtless have learned where seamless stockings are made, and many crudities and inconsistencies in their bill would probably have been avoided.

Returning to the tariff discussion, let us glance at some significant facts which the Tenth Census reveals, and which any industrious Congressman, doubting the correctness of the statements, can verify for himself. And first let us look at the cotton industry.

In spinning cotton the six New England States make use of nearly ten millions of spindles, and in the weaving of cotton fabrics over two hundred thousand looms, employing more than one hundred and fifty thousand people in the cotton factories alone. Of the two hundred millions of dollars which represent the total capital invested in all the States of the Union in cotton manufactures, these six New England States hold within their bounds about one hundred and seventy millions of it in mills, machinery, and other things necessary to their work, and they pay to their one hundred and fifty thousand operatives over thirty-five million dollars annually.

Of the seven hundred and fifty-three million pounds of cotton actually consumed in the mills of the country, New England uses five hundred and forty-one million pounds annually, leaving only two hundred million pounds to be used in all the other States. Now, gentlemen of the South, or more particularly of the cotton States, glance along the line of the coast to the north of you, and let your eyes rest for a moment upon that section of the country which many of your people believe produces only ice and granite, and ask yourselves the question whether you want to follow the behests of your President and destroy so valuable a market for the cotton of your people.

Remember, too, that the Southern States do not produce one-half of the cotton used in the world, and that England is pushing cotton raising with great vigor wherever it can be produced in her dominions. Strike down New England, your best customer, put yourselves at the mercy of European nations, and then see how long it will be until the present rate of 8 cents per pound which you now receive for your cotton on your farms as against 14 cents under the high tariff in 1881 will be still further reduced. The South to-day consumes only 3 per cent. of her own cotton crops.

Let the South beware, lest by her own votes and her tampering with existing tariff laws she strikes down and destroys her best customer, and thus does violence to her own people. And let me further suggest, that while the value of all cotton material annually used in manufacturing in this country is about one hundred and two million dollars, these six New England States use seventy-four millions of it, or more than two-thirds of the whole, and that while the value of all the manufactured cotton product of the country in 1880 was one hundred and ninety-two million dollars, these six States made over one hundred and forty-three millions of it, while the product of the South was only forty-nine millions.

What we want, and what will most benefit the South, is to so adjust our laws as to practically exclude the product of European cotton mills from our country. In 1886 we imported thirty million dollars' worth of cotton goods, and during the last fiscal year thirty-five millions. Reduce the tariff on cotton and these importations necessarily further increase. These goods come in under a duty averaging about 40 per cent. ad valorem, thus showing that European cotton mills can pay this high duty and yet compete with our own. Lower the duty, increase importations, and what becomes of the proposition to reduce the surplus in this way? It will be increased instead of lessened.

There is one other important fact in connection with the importation of these sixty-five million dollars' worth of cotton goods in two years. Every fiber of thread used in their manufacture was probably American cotton exported, and valued at about one-quarter of the cost of the cotton goods. If the fifteen million dollars' worth of cotton exported and returned to us at a cost of sixty-five million dollars had been manufactured in the United States, there would have been fifty million dollars to distribute among thousands of men and women who would have been making good wages to manufacture these goods, and in turn the wages paid to them would have gone to the farmers and dairymen and meat packers, and to all the classes who produce the food which these thousands would have consumed, and which they would have been enabled to purchase because of the wages earned in manufacturing these cotton goods.

In the entire country there are about two hundred and sixty thousand manufacturing establishments of all kinds, employing two million seven hundred and fifty thousand people. The total capital invested in 1880 was nearly three billions of dollars. The total value of all material used was about three and one-half billion dollars, while the aggregate annual value of the products thereof was over five and one-half billion dollars. The share that the six New England States, with less than one-thirteenth of the population of the country, take in this combined manufacturing industry of the Union is that of about thirty-five thousand manufactories, or over one-eighth of all, and they employ six hundred and fifty thousand people, more than one-fifth of the entire number.

Of the total capital invested they employ within their own borders over six hundred and fifty millions, more than one-fifth of all; of the total value of materials used they consume nearly seven hundred millions, over one-sixth of the whole; and they yield in products of manufacture nearly twelve hundred millions of dollars, about one-fifth of all. And yet it is coolly proposed by hostile legislation to strike down this great wealth-producing, tax-paying section of our country, the section from which came the money to bind the Eastern States to the Pacific Ocean with bands of iron, which out of her abundance has built Western railroads and Western cities, and which to-day stands with open hand and generous purse ready to help rehabilitate the South whenever in good faith she is invited so to do.

In the common neighborhood trades of carpentering and blacksmithing New England produces nearly twenty million dollars, about one-fourth of that of the entire country, and in blacksmithing alone six million dollars, or about one-seventh of all.

In the manufacture of wood pulp there is invested nearly two million dollars, material used amounts to a little less than one million, and the manufactured product sells for two millions and a quarter. In this industry New England's share is nearly one million of capital; she expends over half a million for materials, and her product yields one million three hundred thousand dollars, or about 60 per cent. of the whole.

The manufacture of lumber into useful things, apart from agricultural implements, carriages, toys, tools, etc., in the United States, employs about thirty-two thousand people, with twenty-nine millions of capital. About thirty million dollars' worth of material is consumed, yielding an annual product of fifty million dollars. In this industry the New England States employ six thousand people, nearly one-fifth of the whole. They have seven millions of capital invested or about one-fourth of all. Of the material they use eight millions in value, not quite one-third, and render products aggregating fifteen million dollars, or over 30 per cent. of the entire amount.

Apart from the manufacture of boots and shoes, the chief industries in leather in the United States employ about seventy-three million dollars capital, the value of the material used is one hundred and fifty-six million dollars, and the manufactured product is worth over two hundred million dollars. In this vast industry the New England States employ fifteen millions of capital, or about one-fifth of all. They expend for material forty-eight million dollars, nearly one-third of all, while the value of their manufactured product is sixty million dollars, greatly more than one-fourth of the whole.

In the manufacture of boots and shoes the entire country employs forty-three million dollars in capital; over one hundred and two million dollars are expended for material, and from it products are manufactured to the value of over one hundred and sixty-six millions of dollars. Of this industry, felt and known in every home of the nation, and marked in the foot-prints of the legislators from the Southern States, the six New England States employ nearly twenty-five millions of capital, considerably more than one-half of all; they pay seventy millions of dollars for material, about three-fourths of all, and yield a product of one hundred and twelve million dollars, slightly over two-thirds of the whole, and are the best customer for hides that the South has or will have in all time to come.

The manufacture of iron bolts, washers, and rivets employs a capital in the entire country of nearly five millions of dollars; the materials used are worth about six millions, and the finished product aggregates ten millions. In this manufacture New England furnishes one and three-fourths of a million capital; of the cost of material she pays one and one-fourth of a million, and yields a finished product of nearly two and a quarter million dollars, her part in the entire manufacture being about one-fourth of the whole.

In iron forgings about four million dollars capital is employed in the country; the value of the material used is four million dollars, and the product reaches about six and one-half millions. In this branch of industry New England has a capital of over one million dollars, or more than one-fourth of all; she pays for material six hundred thousand dollars annually, and her manufactured product is one and a quarter millions, nearly 25 per cent. of the whole.

The manufacture of sewing-machines requires a capital of thirteen million dollars; the material used costs five million dollars, and the annual manufactured product is fourteen millions. New England furnishes seven and a half millions of the capital, nearly 60 per cent.; she pays for materials over one and a quarter millions, more than one-fourth of all, and her production is over four and a half millions, or about 33 per cent. of the entire product.

In the manufacture of straw goods about three and a half million dollars is invested, material is used to the amount of five and a half millions, and the finished product is worth nine and a half millions. In this important industry New England furnishes over two and a half millions, or 75 per cent. of the whole, expends for material over four and a quarter millions, or nearly 80 per cent. of the aggregate, and gives a finished product of seven and a half millions, over seven-ninths of it all.

The country at large has invested in the manufacture of tools and cutlery a capital of about fourteen and a half millions; the material used annually costs six and a half millions, and the product is over sixteen millions. Of this New England furnishes capital to the amount of six millions, nearly one-half of the whole; she expends two and three-fourths millions for material, slightly less than one-half, and returns a finished product of seven and a half millions, or nearly 50 per cent. of it all.

In foundry and machine-shop productions the country has invested one hundred and fifty-five millions of dollars; materials used amount to one hundred and three and a half millions, and the annual product therefrom is about two hundred and four millions of dollars. New England's investment in this industry is over thirty-one millions of dollars; she pays for material twenty millions, and her finished product is worth forty-three millions, or about one-fifth of the entire capital, the cost of manufacture, and value of finished products.

In steam-fitting and heating, nails, spikes, pipe, railings, steel springs, and architectural and ornamental iron-work, the total capital of the country invested is sixteen and a half million dollars, of which New England has five millions, the material costs twenty millions, of which New England pays four and a half millions, and the manufactured product is thirty-one millions, New England's share being seven and a quarter millions.

In the manufacture of fire-arms the entire capital employed is about eight and one-fourth million dollars; the material used costs one million eight hundred thousand dollars, and the product aggregates a value of five and three-fourths millions. In this industry New England has almost a monopoly, furnishing over seven million dollars of the capital, being about seven-eighths of the whole, spending for material one million six hundred thousand dollars, or sixteen-eighteenths of it all, and furnishing a production of over four and three-fourths millions, leaving one million for the rest of the country; and notwithstanding she has the monopoly no fault is heard of the rate of wages paid in this industry, nor has any disturbance occurred among the laborers so employed.

In the manufacture of mens' clothing the country has invested a capital of eighty millions of dollars; the value of materials used is one hundred and thirty-one millions, and the production aggregates two hundred and nine millions. In this industry New England has a capital of eight millions, she invests over fifteen millions in materials, and yields a product of about twenty-four millions of dollars.

The manufacture of hosiery and knit goods in the country gives employment to sixteen millions of capital, uses material to the value of fifteen millions, a large part of which is imported, and the finished product is worth at wholesale about twenty-nine millions. In this industry New England furnishes about one-third of the capital (five and a quarter millions), uses over one-fourth of the material (four and a quarter millions), and produces one-third of the finished material (about eight millions).

The manufacture of carpets in the United States has been largely developed during the period of the high tariff. We now successfully compete with the best manufacturers of Europe, in Brussels, ingrain, Wilton, Axminster, Venetian, tapestry, velvet, cottage, and Dutch carpets, as well as rugs, druggets, lastings, and serges. The country has invested a capital of twenty-two millions of dollars in these manufactures of wool, which give employment to twenty-one thousand people, whose wages are upward of seven millions of dollars annually.

The materials used include thirty-five million pounds of foreign wool, two million pounds of domestic wool, twenty-five million pounds of scoured wool, inclusive of waste and shoddy, besides about fifty million pounds of mohair and camel's hair. These materials, together with chemicals, dye-stuffs, etc., cost the manufacturers about twenty millions a year, and the finished product sells for about thirty-three millions of dollars. In this industry the New England States have invested eight millions of dollars, more than one-third of the whole, and they give employment to five thousand people, paying them over three millions of dollars annually. They use nearly one-half of the foreign wool, thus being the heaviest tariff payers, and also use almost one-half of the scoured wool. Their annual production is worth, at wholesale prices, over ten millions of dollars, or nearly one-third of the total product of the country.

In the making of felt goods there is invested in the country about two millions of dollars, the value of the material used is two and three-fourths millions, and the total value of the manufactured product is about four millions. In this field New England has over one and a half million dollars invested, about 80 per cent. of the whole, and her manufactured product is not far from three millions of dollars, or 75 per cent. of the entire amount.

In the manufacture of woolen goods, exclusive of carpets, mixed textiles, and felt, the capital invested aggregates ninety-six millions of dollars, nearly fifty-two millions of which is contributed by New England. Materials used amounts to one hundred millions of dollars annually, New England's share being fifty-nine millions; and the finished product amounts to one hundred and sixty millions, of which ninety-five millions belong to New England.

The capital invested in the manufacture of worsteds is a little over twenty millions of dollars, of which New England has over thirteen millions. The material used aggregates twenty-two millions, of which New England uses thirteen millions, and the manufactured product is thirty-three millions, twenty millions of which is credited to the New England States.

I have enumerated most of the leading industries of New England. To them might well be added the manufacture of paper, of lumber in various forms, and other products of our fields and forests, all of which are threatened with annihilation by the Mills tariff bill. I might also dwell on the disastrous results of placing wool on the free-list, which will seriously affect almost every farmer in New England, but as others will discuss that I desist, simply adding that so long as Australian sheep lands are leased for 5 cents per acre and Australian shepherds work for $7 per week and board themselves, free wool means the complete destruction of the sheep industry of the United States for the benefit of foreign sheep-owners. But that is the Democratic programme, and that the idea of a great political party which claims to be the friend of American labor! But I can not leave this topic without adverting to Brazilian and other South American wools, the cheapness of which is startling, and cuts out the growth of the American product even under existing tariff laws. The effect of the removal of the duty on these wools is well illustrated by the fact that when we removed the tariff from coffee a few years ago Brazil, at the instance of England, immediately put an export duty on the article, so that coffee to-day is nearly as high to the consumer as in the years of the war. The same will undoubtedly be true of wool if that product is placed on the free list, under which circumstances it will not be many years until our home market is entirely supplied by foreign wool-growers.

That is the part New England takes in the field of industrial pursuits.

Her prosperity is indissolubly connected with tariff legislation, and the message of the President has sent a thrill of distrust and fear through her people. Did they believe that the nation would indorse that message the factories and workshops of New England would be for sale, and the South would have an opportunity to invest in that kind of property at a bargain. Fortunately, they do not believe this calamity is to overtake them, and so they are reaching out and planning for even greater things in the future.

These are some of the triumphs of New England. They speak for themselves and need no defense at my hands. This little rock-ribbed, ice-bound section of our country has thirty-two thousand manufacturing establishments, with six hundred and twenty-five millions of capital invested in them, paying annually in wages to employés the enormous sum of three hundred and four millions, expending for material six hundred and sixty millions, and furnishing a net manufactured product of over eleven hundred millions of dollars. On the other hand, the twelve Southern States have thirty-five thousand manufacturing establishments of all kinds; they have invested in them one hundred and eighty millions of capital; they pay less than fifty millions yearly for wages, and the total annual value of their production is only three hundred and twenty millions.

Let me make one other point of comparison. I find that the total estimated true valuation of all property in the country in 1880 was about forty-four billions of dollars, the assessed valuation being seventeen billions, or about 39 per cent. of the whole. Of this property the six New England States had five billions and the twelve Southern States six billions, but the five billions of New England property was assessed for taxation at two billions six hundred and fifty millions, while the six billions of the South were assessed at only two billions two hundred and twenty-nine millions. Thus it will be seen that the six New England States, with less than five millions of people, pay in revenue to the Government more than the twelve Southern States, with over fifteen millions of people. Might it not be well for some of our Southern friends on this floor when they are talking of the robberies and extortions of New England manufacturers to pay a little attention to this circumstance and explain how it happens that five billions of Northern property should be worth four hundred and twenty millions of dollars more for the purposes of taxation than six billions of Southern property?

Let me also call attention to the fact that there is in New England a form of banking almost exclusively for the protection of the earnings of labor. The New England system of savings-banks stands apart from all other financial enterprises. The savings-banks in these six States hold in trust the enormous sum of five hundred and seventy-five million dollars, or considerably more than one-half the amount in all the savings-banks of the country, which aggregates one billion three hundred and seventy-eight million dollars. In the report of the Comptroller of the Currency I find mention of but one savings-bank in the Southern States, having on deposit eleven thousand six hundred and seventy-two dollars. There are in the United States forty-two official trust companies, aggregating about two hundred and forty-eight millions of resources. Nineteen of these companies, representing fifty-seven millions, or nearly one-fourth of the whole, are in New England. There are none in the twelve Southern States, and for trusts and guaranties they rely on the North.

In New England there is deposited in savings-banks over one hundred and twenty dollars for every man, woman, and child, while in the South, upon the basis of the figures of the Comptroller, there is just about one-fourth of a cent per capita. This immense fund, five hundred and seventy-five million dollars, represents to a large extent the earnings of the laboring classes (including the farmers) of New England, and is of itself the grandest possible tribute to their industry, thrift, and capacity. And when are added the millions of New England capital invested in loans, in property in Western cities, and in Western, Southern, and transcontinental railways, some idea can be formed of the prosperity of her people.

But it is said that this prosperity is the result of the tariff laws, which rob the farmers of the West and South to enrich New England. No greater fallacy than this can be imagined. Agriculture thrives in proportion as manufacturing is prosperous. Agriculture in the North will be crushed out when President Cleveland's free-trade notions are adopted, thus destroying our manufacturing centers, which furnish a ready market for the products of our farms. When manufacturing is developed in the South and West farmers will thrive because they will have home markets for what they raise, and every class will feel and share the benefits which flow from enterprise and business thrift.

The simple and undeniable fact is that while New England is extensively engaged in manufactures, agriculture is not neglected by her people. Evidently this is not understood by some men who have engaged in this discussion. Under a high protective tariff manufacturing towns and villages have sprung up on every hand, giving the farmer a home market for his products and putting ready money in his pocket. It is estimated that at least one-third of the five hundred and seventy-five millions in New England savings-banks belongs to farmers. In the New England States fully 75 per cent. of the farms are occupied and worked by their owners, and no agricultural people on the face of the earth have as many comforts and luxuries as the farmers of the New England States.

The area of New England farms is about twenty-two million acres, of which fifteen million acres are under tillage, three hundred and two thousand persons being employed on them. The acreage of farm land in the Southern States is two hundred and thirty-one million acres, of which about seventy-eight million acres are tilled, giving employment to three and a half million people, not over 25 per cent. of whom own a foot of the land they work on, and not 25 per cent. of those who own the land either live, work on, or exercise any care over them beyond collecting their rents. As to the relative value of farm lands, the last census shows that the twenty-two million acres of New England farms were valued at five hundred and eighty-two million dollars, while the two hundred and thirty-one million acres of Southern farms, more than ten times the area of New England, were valued at fifteen hundred and thirty-five million dollars, or less than two and three-fourth times the value of the one-tenth area situated in bleak New England.

The value of farm implements and farm machinery in New England is twenty-three million dollars, while in the twelve Southern States, with more than ten times the farm acreage, the value is less than sixty-eight million dollars. Of the two hundred and eighty-five million of tilled acres in the United States the New England States till more than one-sixteenth of the whole, notwithstanding some men on this floor never miss an opportunity to speak slightingly of agriculture in the New England States.

Of the fifty-one million dollars' worth of orchard products in the country New England produces four million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth, while the sunny South, with her warm climate and superior facilities, produces a yield of only six millions in value. Of the twenty-two million dollars' worth of market-garden products of the country New England produces two million six hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth, as against two million eight hundred and forty-six thousand dollars in the South.

Of the thirty-five million tons of hay grown in the United States icy New England produces over four million tons, or more than one-ninth of the entire product, while the twelve States of the South, who propose to give us a tariff for agricultural purposes, yield slightly over nine hundred thousand tons, or less than one thirty-fifth of the whole.

The rice crop of the South is about one hundred and ten million pounds, which, at three cents per pound, amounts to about three and a half million dollars. Add to this their hay crop at ten dollars per ton (a large price for Southern hay), and the total will be less than twelve and a half million dollars. The hay crop of New England at ten dollars per ton (and New England farmers get more money than that for their hay) will pay for the hay and rice crops of the Southern States and leave a balance of twenty-seven million dollars.

Of the Irish potato crop of the country, aggregating one hundred and sixty-nine million bushels, the New England States yield twenty-three million bushels, or one-seventh of it all, while the Southern States produce less than eight and a quarter million bushels. Of the thirty-four million bushels of sweet potatoes raised in the country, the Southern States produce nearly twenty-nine million bushels, but as 50 cents per bushel is as much as the crop can command at the South, the New England States can, from the twenty-seven and a half millions of dollars left over from its hay crop, after buying the rice and hay crop of the South, easily pay for the combined potato crop of the Southern States, and then have ten millions of dollars left with which to corner their wheat crop, and reduce them to short commons for bread.

The value of all live stock on farms in the United States in 1880 was, in round numbers, one billion five hundred million dollars. Of this the six New England States owned about seventy millions and the twelve Southern States three hundred and seven millions. Included in this estimated value are about twelve and a half million milch cows, of which seven hundred and fifty thousand are in New England and three million one hundred and twenty thousand in the Southern States, or nearly one-third of the entire number in the country. And yet of the five hundred and thirty million gallons of milk sold or sent to butter and cheese factories in the United States the Southern States, with four times as many milch cows as New England, supplied less than eight and a half million gallons, while the New England States supplied sixty-two million gallons.

Perhaps some Southern Representative will vouchsafe an explanation of this astounding fact. Certainly, if no explanation is given, we will be justified in concluding either that Southern cows are poorly fed and poorly housed, that the milk is used to increase the navigation of the nameless streams that Congress is asked to appropriate money for [laughter], or that utter thriftlessness and waste prevail at the South, none of the economies and care that distinguish New England having found a foothold among those who own cattle in the Southern States.

Again, of the seven hundred and seventy-seven million pounds of butter produced in the nation the Southern States furnished about one hundred and four million pounds from over three million cows, or about one-third of a pound to a cow, while the New England States furnished sixty-six million pounds from seven hundred and fifty thousand cows, or eighty-eight pounds per cow.

The same discrepancy exists in regard to cheese, statistics showing that of the twenty-seven million pounds made in the country the Southern States furnished only four hundred and thirty-eight thousand pounds, while the output of the New England States was about five and a quarter million pounds, or about seven and a quarter pounds per cow, in addition to the butter product.

The busy people of New England have little time to indulge the taste of chicken fanciers, yet of the four hundred and fifty-seven million dozens of eggs produced in the country, according to the last census, thirty million dozens, or about one-fifteenth of the whole, is credited to New England.

The Southern States, with a vastly greater number of fowls, had a product of less than eighty-nine million dozens. But what is of more consequence than the amount of the product is the significant fact that in New England eggs commanded a price about four times as great as that secured in the South, and the same is relatively true of the milk, butter, and cheese product of the two sections, due solely to the fact that New England has a home market for such products, a natural outcome of her manufacturing industries.

These are hard, stubborn facts, for which the Tenth Census is responsible. New England farms have long been carefully and intelligently tilled by the hands of free men, and notwithstanding the sterile soil and early frosts she produces per acre twice the yield of wheat, corn, oats, and rye that is credited to the South. New England farmers, New England mechanics, and New England workingmen are all prosperous, the result of diversified industries and ready markets. When the South learns this simple lesson in political economy her rallying cry will be protection, and she will enter upon an era of prosperity such as she has not yet even dreamed of.

I know that I have given more figures than people like to read. The free-trade theorists avoid figures always, or if they use them they are not taken from census reports. Like James Russell Lowell before he apostatized, and when he wrote the famous Biglow Papers, they say:

> I go free trade thru thick an' thin,
> Because it kind o' rouses
> The folks to vote, an' keeps us in > Our quiet custom-houses.

If the genuine revenue reformers in this House, the men who are shouting themselves hoarse over the President's late message, will "read, learn, mark, and inwardly digest" the facts and figures on this question there will be some hope of their conversion. And if the people of this country will calmly and without prejudice inform themselves on the issue presented by President Cleveland they will thrust from power next November the political party which, ignoring the plain teachings of history and the lessons of industrial science, are girding on the armor of practical free trade and preparing to engage in a death-grapple with the principle of protection, which has made our nation the envy of the world. For my part, I prefer the protective to the destructive policy. New England prefers it, and the nation will prefer it as soon as the issue is clearly defined.

The President lays great stress on the necessity for admitting what he terms "raw materials" free of duty. Now, what is "raw material?" The best definition I have seen is this: "Actual raw material is a product of the earth in its normal condition." It must be something produced by nature, and into which neither labor nor money has entered. There are no such materials in the sense used by the President. Even the water we drink is not a raw material, because money and labor are used to bring it to our homes. Strange as it may seem, some Republicans have gone wrong on this question of raw materials. But it is at best a transparent fallacy.

The moment labor touches or money moves anything it becomes in part a result of human effort, and industry and capital are component parts of it. Neither wool, lumber, salt, iron ore, or pig-iron is a raw material. Indeed the only raw material I know of are the Democratic statesmen (?) who insist that there is such a thing. [Laughter.]

The President also undertakes to stir up strife by insinuating that the people are being robbed by the tariff laws and made to pay exorbitant prices for the necessaries of life. It is not necessary to argue the fact, so well known to those who have investigated it, that the tariff does not ordinarily enhance prices, while it frequently greatly lowers them. To-day there is competition in trade. Break down the tariff, let England take possession of our markets, and competition ends. Then England will fix the price of her commodities without let or hinderance.

That fact has been demonstrated over and over again. It is human nature, and will assert itself whenever opportunity offers. Now, I maintain, without fear of successful contradiction, that the relative purchasing power of a dollar is as great to-day as in any period of our national history—that is, that considering the rates of wages the consumer can afford as many of the necessaries and luxuries of life as in any former period. Food is cheap, clothing is cheap, dry-goods are cheap, indeed everything is marvelously cheap, and the President's great solicitude about the workingman is a sham and a delusion. The real pinch will come to the laboring men of this country when the President's policy is enacted into law, which will compel American manufacturers to either reduce wages or go out of business.

Very likely the existing tariff laws need some revision, but they should not be revised on the basis proposed by the bill under consideration. If a thorough revision is made it should be made by friendly hands, by Republicans, not by Democrats—by protectionists, not by revenue-reformers. The tariff on some articles may need be reduced, on others it might with propriety be increased. The simple fact is, and the whole tariff argument is summed up in it, all the products required for the support of our sixty millions of people must be supplied by somebody's labor. In proportion as they are supplied by foreign labor just in that proportion American laborers—whether they are farmers or day laborers—are left without work and without wages. Free trade offers to give away our magnificent markets to any farmers or laborers on earth who will take them, at the expense of our own people. We should not make any effort for the world's markets until we have fully developed our own, both in labor and production, and when we have done this then will come our own foreign-carrying trade, and that, too, at a point in our history when it will pay better to build a ship than it will a factory or a railroad.

If this market could be supplied by Americans, not an American would have to be idle, and the labor problem would be solved. Whoever controls the market fixes the price. If a foreign product has the monopoly it can command a profit as enormous and a price as exorbitant as it pleases. Hence under free trade articles have sold for three, four, and even five times as much as the same articles have afterward brought under protection, when American products had gained control of their own markets. No foreign goods which can be manufactured in this country can be cheap to us at any price. No man or party who is a traitor to the best interests of our workingmen should receive their support. No sophistry can wipe out the real facts. Let us have no enriching of Australian sheep-men at the expense of our farmers, or of English manufacturers at the expense of our wage-earners. That is my platform, and I believe it is the platform of the Republican party.

The Democratic defenders of the Mills tariff bill insist that free trade is beneficial to the laboring classes. If this be so how does it happen that British mechanics and laborers flock to this country to better their condition, while American laborers and mechanics never go to England in search of work and wages? The whole scheme of reducing the tariff will benefit England at the expense of America. When the Morrison tariff bill was defeated in the Forty-ninth Congress the London Daily Telegraph editorially said:

> A bill to establish in America what the English call free trade has just been defeated in the House by the narrow majority of 4. The measure was of enormous importance for English manufacturers, as it would have enabled them to export goods to the States without the crushing tariff now imposed, and its fate was watched with intense interest by Englishmen. Were it passed it would have been worth £100,000,000 per annum to British manufacturers.

Surely it is fortunate for the Republican party and fortunate for the industries of the North that England's vote is not to be counted in the next Presidential election, for her vote, with that of the solid South, would triumphantly re-elect the man who so audaciously attacks the industrial system of the nation.

But it is said that the large surplus in the Treasury must be got rid of. The President said that, the Secretary of the Treasury said it, and every Democratic newspaper and orator has echoed and re-echoed the sentiment. Well, the Republican party managed in 1860 to provide for the deficit which they inherited from the Buchanan administration, and it will be strange if the combined wisdom of Congress can not take care of a surplus without destroying the industries of New England and the North.

To my mind if the free list is to be enlarged it ought to be done by adding sugar to it, an article which enters into the consumption of every man, woman, and child in the land, and which probably never can be developed to a point where it will supply the demand of our people. In this country two billions eight hundred million pounds of sugar are annually consumed, and only about three hundred millions, or a little over one-tenth of the whole, is produced at home, the other nine-tenths being imported. On this imported sugar we collected a revenue last year of fifty-eight millions of dollars; and this enormous revenue was collected to protect a few hundred sugar-planters in Louisiana and two or three other Southern States.

Year by year the consumption of sugar is increasing, while the sugar production of Louisiana is practically at a standstill. If we are to have free trade in anything, here is a good place to begin. Not a reduction of the tariff on it, but absolute free trade in sugar is what should be insisted on if the South persists in striking down Northern products. But President Cleveland does not suggest free sugar, and the Democratic Ways and Means Committee of this House do not suggest it. Oh! no. That would strike Democratic States. That might disturb the harmony of the solid South. They have their eyes on the wool industry of Ohio, the iron industry of Pennsylvania, the cotton manufacturing industry of New England, and the lumber industry of the Pacific Slope, Michigan, and certain Northern States. In fact their notions of free trade do not seem to travel south of the Potomac, or to seriously affect any industry in the States from which the 153 Democratic electoral votes never fail to come.

Another Southern product which might properly be given a taste of tariff reform is rice. Just why the agricultural products of the North should be left practically unprotected by the Mills bill, and thus put in competition with the cheaper products of Canada, while rice, which to-day is protected by a tariff nearly four times as large as it was before the war, is left undisturbed, is a conundrum hard to answer. True, rice is grown entirely south of the Potomac—it is exclusively a Southern product—but that ought not to be a valid reason for exempting it from the provisions of so sweeping a measure as the one we are now considering.

Before the war rice was raised in quantities that, after supplying the home demand, left some for export. To-day the production is 50 per cent. greater than in 1860, the annual product now being one hundred and fifty million pounds. If it was raised at a profit before the war, the profit now, under the high tariff of 2 cents per pound, must be exorbitant, and if it is the settled policy of the Democratic party to reduce the tariff on agricultural products I insist that the rice planters of the South should be given some of this Southern revenue-reform medicine.

But to return to the surplus. That it is large is undeniable, but it is large not so much because our tariff laws are too high, as because of the niggardly policy of the Democratic party. In the Forty-ninth Congress every Republican favored and voted for the pension bill presented by the Grand Army of the Republic, which, if it had become a law, would have removed the stigma of our having twenty thousand veterans of the late war in the almshouses of the country. This beneficent measure, which would have helped solve the problem of the surplus, was antagonized by a large number of Democratic votes in the House, and was vetoed by the same President who now hysterically shrieks that the surplus is so large as to endanger the business interests of the country. The Republicans also were largely in favor of the Blair educational bill, but that measure was strangled by a Democratic committee. The Republicans favored adequate seacoast defences, but the Democratic majority pronounced against it. The Republicans earnestly desired to do something toward re-establishing the American merchant marine by liberal appropriations to American steam-ships, especially those engaged in carrying the mails to the West Indies and South America, but the Democratic party shouted "no!" with a unanimity that was at once startling and suggestive. That is the record, and that is the chief reason why the surplus is so large to-day. [Applause.]

The Republicans in this Congress favor the same measures, and if the Democrats will join in such legislation the surplus now held will be distributed, sending joy and gladness to the veterans of the war, distributing millions upon millions among the laboring people of the land, lifting out of ignorance and degradation a race to whose elevation the nation is solemnly pledged, and opening markets for our products in countries where England to-day has a practical monopoly. Gentlemen of the Democratic party, will you do it? The answer can be anticipated. Instead of this statesmanlike way of meeting the exigency you propose to attempt its solution by dealing a death blow to some of the leading industries of the Northern States.

Instead of striking down Northern enterprises and destroying Northern communities it will be wisdom for the South to change her economic notions and to imitate New England by establishing on her streams diversified manufacturing industries. This will give remunerative employment to her people, build up her waste places, develop thrift, accumulate money, and bring to that section of our common country a higher degree of happiness and prosperity than are now enjoyed. This will be good business judgment, good politics, and good sense.

Then they will see and realize the beauties and advantages of tariff laws, and then they will join with the North in the expression of the opinion that "the Government which taxes its own and gives freedom to the alien is simply an engine of tyranny and oppression, which ours should never be." And in the conflict soon to come, in the forum of public debate and at the ballot-box, between the views of the President and those of the Republican party, I feel confident that the patriotism, the pride, and the business instincts of the American people will prevail, and that the party which takes a sectional view of this great question, and which seeks to degrade labor by opening the markets of our country to the semi-barbarism of Australia and the poorly-paid labor of Europe and of Canada will be swept ignominiously from power. [Applause.]

As a Northern man I rejoice to note the tendency in certain Southern States to break away from the old notions of that section on the question of a tariff. I rejoice to read the utterances of Southern men who refuse longer to be bound to the car of revenue reform. Listen to the words of Maj. J. F. Hanson, of Macon, Ga., a Democratic cotton manufacturer:

President Cleveland's message was arrogant and presumptuous, and displayed absolute indifference to the pledges of the platform upon which he was elected as well as profound ignorance of the questions upon which he presumes to lecture Congress and the country. This was bad faith, bad manners, and bad politics combined, and it presents to the Democratic party the alternative either of renominating President Cleveland, with the assurance beforehand of his defeat, or of throwing him overboard as a Presidential candidate.

I presume I am not mistaken in saying that the following eloquent utterances are from a letter written a year or two ago by Hon. GEORGE D. TILLMAN, of South Carolina, a distinguished member of this body, in response to an invitation to become a member of a free-trade club:

Shall we of the Palmetto State always be self-idolatrous Bourbons, never forgetting, never learning anything? Was it not our intemperate zeal for free trade that led to nullification, and was it not as much to enjoy free trade as to protect slavery that South Carolina seceded in 1860? Hence what issue can better revive sectional hate or reopen the healing wounds of the war than for the "cradle of rebellion" to begin, at this early stage of the next canvass, to agitate the old cause of the quarrel—free trade—when protection is the settled policy of a large majority of the Northern people?

No other Southern State, as I am advised, is at present trying to lash itself into furor of excitement against a protective tariff. Then why should we volunteer to preach a crusade for redressing the supposed wrongs of the agricultural States of the South and West? Surely we can bear the ills of protection as long as they can.

It is as true now as it ever was that whoever spits against the wind spits in his own face; and considering that South Carolina's policy led to the war which forced the Government to contract a debt of nearly three thousand million dollars, the payment of the interest and principal of which, together with providing for current expenses and pensions, requires an annual revenue of nearly three hundred million dollars, is it becoming in South Carolina to prate about free trade?

Whether it shall please South Carolina or the other ex-Confederate States or not, either incidentally or per se, protection will for a great while remain the law of this land, as has been the case since the war, and as was the case for considerable periods at different times before the war. If manufactures and a high tariff have made the North rich, why should not we avail ourselves of the same means to make money? Manufactures do undoubtedly multiply values, increase employments, diversify industries, raise wages, found towns, establish schools, accumulate wealth, and improve a community in innumerable ways.

What have we to show in South Carolina for two hundred years of devotion to free trade and exclusive agriculture, except worn-out land, 600,000 negroes, and universal suffrage? Where are our factories, our mines, our ships, our banks, our charities, our libraries, our colleges, our inventions, our sciences, our literature, or our arts? Is the result so cheering as to invite us still further to tread in the footsteps of our fathers, and not only to denounce all manufactures, but wear home-made cloth, as they did in the days of nullification, to discourage the use of factory cloth protected by a tariff?

In any community which has but one occupation, say agriculture, wages are generally low, except at short periods of seed and harvest time. When stagnation comes, as come it must in every profession and calling at times, how universal the depression.

I boldly avow myself the ardent friend of manufacturing at the South, as I believe it is the only means that can bring us prosperity, wealth, immigration, general education, or high civilization.

And Hon. JOSEPH E. BROWN, United States Senator from Georgia, in a speech delivered in the Senate, March 4, 1888, made use of the following emphatic language:

But it is time we were reflecting upon this question, and asking how is it that the people of the North have grown rich by manufacturing and commerce, though they may have had the benefit of protection? Did they have superior advantages or greater resources than the South? By no means. No section of the Union, and probably no portion of the continent or of the civilized world, has advantages superior to those enjoyed by the Southern section of this Union. We have a genial climate, a healthy country, immense fertility of soil; in fact, great varieties of soil and climate, adapted to the culture of almost every crop that is grown in this country. We have the orange belt along the coast; we have the sugar and rice lands in great abundance. Above that we have the cotton belt; then the belt where clover and the different grasses grow and flourish admirably well; then comes our vast mineral belt, where the bowels of the earth are store-houses of inestimable wealth. We have iron, manganese, marble, and coal, and almost every mineral known to the catalogue, including rich gold mines in great abundance. We have water-power without limit, enough to run all the machinery of this continent; and if we prefer steam the coal is at hand to make it. In a word, the natural advantages of the Southern country are surpassed by no other country on the globe. Why, then, should we lag behind in poverty?

If the North, with less resources and less genial climate, has grown immensely rich by manufacturing, and shipping, and commerce, should we not imitate their example, and with our better climate and greater facilities and resources move forward on the same line, and in the course of half a century accumulate greater wealth than they have piled up under a like system? For half a century, while we were planting cotton, or while we were engaged in war, and while we have been reconstructing society and government, the people North have availed themselves of our tariff legislation, and with great energy and zeal have engaged in manufacturing and commerce. They now have immense capital invested in manufacturing plants. They have skilled labor in abundance. They have had long experience, and they are approximating the condition where they will be able to compete with the English manufacturer almost upon equal terms. Indeed, in some of the branches of manufactures they could now compete if it were not for the great advantage that the British manufacturers have in cheap labor. As matters now stand, however, New England is much further advanced than the Southern States are in manufacturing, and Old England is still further advanced than New England.

And again Senator BROWN said:

No section of this Union is as much interested as the South in sustaining a liberal and just tariff, which, while it raises all the revenue we need, affords all the incidental protection possible to the manufacturing industries of this country. We complain that the Northern people have grown rich by perseverance in manufacturing under our tariff system. As we have greatly superior natural advantages, instead of making war on them, suppose we imitate their example and go forward in the development of our resources and the manufacture of our raw material, the diversity of our labor, of our crops, and of our productions, and let us see if we can not in this way grow rich and powerful, as the people of the North have done, by adopting their line of policy, which created their wealth. Instead of lagging behind and crying out against a policy which has greatly enriched a sister section of the Union, let us go forward as a determined competitor, and with our greatly superior advantages finally bear off the palm of victory in progress, development, and wealth.

It is safe to assert that if the Mills tariff bill runs the gauntlet of this House there will be one Democratic vote against it in the Senate of the United States.

In this conflict there are the ideas of two distinct civilizations, the one born of the spirit of oppression and aristocracy, and the other springing from the men who fought the wars of religious toleration in both the Old and the New World, and who came to New England to found a nation devoted to industry, progress, thrift, and political and religious liberty. The descendants of these people are not to be halted in their grand march of civilization and industrial prosperity. New England ideas may be, as they have been, mocked at and derided, but the hand of the Lord never permits time to be turned backward.

This nation can not stand still and will not retrograde. It has hitherto gone forward upon the lines marked for it by New England. The South has, reluctantly it may be, adopted many of her ideas, and the South, if she ever expects to become rich and great, will have to adopt more of them. The first gun at Lexington told of the patriotism of New England's sons when her liberties were in danger, and her response to the President's message will equally show her loyalty and courage when her industrial prosperity is threatened. The English and un-American spirit so thoroughly displayed in every sentence of that message is hostile to the interests and repugnant to the teachings of New England. The South may defend them now, but the time is coming when the American purpose and idea of material prosperity, emanating from and pursued on every water-course in New England, at every spot where an industry can be planted, whether near to or remote from rail communication, will be adopted by the Southern States.

When that time comes, as come it must, the illimitable possibilities of the Republic will be shown, and a government strong in all the elements of greatness and wealth will proudly take her place at the head of the nations of the earth. New England has adjusted her industrial affairs to fit the conditions created by the tariff, while the South, with her eyes still fixed on the free-trade notions of ante-bellum days, is plodding in the ruts of long ago. But her Birminghams and her Atlantas are a suggestion of what her future will be when she develops her resources and adopts the American policy of protection to American industries and American labor.

Is there politics in this? some may ask. Yes. Political economy is defined to be "the science which treats of the wealth of nations, and the causes of its increase or diminution; the principles of government." This surely, then, trenches on that ground. It points out to the South the true way to establish and make operative "the science of government." It establishes the higher order of politics in her domain. Not shot-guns, not tissue ballots, not intimidation for opinion's sake, but a fair field and no favor in the general upbuilding and rehabilitation of her territory. Not Copiah and Hamburg and Danville, but cities like Lowell and Lawrence, like Manchester and Lewiston, with their magnificent manufacturing establishments, will spring up all over the South, giving employment to tens of thousands of her people, converting her waste places into thrifty villages and prosperous communities, thus dignifying and ennobling labor, and practically helping to make this great country of ours independent of the productions of European nations.

When this becomes an accomplished fact a free ballot will follow, and the crimes against the suffrage perpetrated in some of the Southern States will of necessity cease. Is it worth the effort? Rather do not patriotism and enterprise alike point to this as the only proper course to pursue?—the one thing more needful than any other to forever obliterate the bitter memories of the conflict of 1861–1865, and reunite our whole people in the grand struggle for supremacy over the other nations of the world—a supremacy established upon the basis of intelligent business enterprises, and fostered and strengthened by intelligent business legislation. For my part I am ready to join in this rivalry, but I am not ready to give my voice or vote for a measure which will despoil my own section, and strike down and destroy the very heart of the nation's business life. This must not—this will not be done. [Great applause.]

During the delivery of Mr. GALLINGER'S remarks, Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, twice endeavored to ask a question, but Mr. GALLINGER declined to yield. When Mr. GALLINGER had occupied one hour the following proceedings took place:

Mr. WEBER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Hampshire be extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. As the committee will rise at half past 5, and as probably no other gentleman will desire to go on this evening, I ask that the gentleman from New Hampshire be allowed sufficient time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not upon the list of the Chair the name of any other gentleman who desires to speak this evening.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I hope my request will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Hampshire be permitted to conclude his remarks—not to extend, of course, beyond the hour of half past 5, when the Committee of the Whole must rise. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from New Hampshire will proceed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 1, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WILLIAM SACKMAN, SR.—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill 465, entitled "An act granting a pension to William Sackman, sr."

The beneficiary named in this bill served from December 24, 1861, to February 29, 1864, in the Fifth Regiment of the Missouri Militia Cavalry.

He was discharged on the day last named for disability. His certificate of discharge states his disability as follows:

"Palpitation of the heart and defective lungs, the disability caused by falling off his horse near Fredericktown, Mo., while intoxicated, on detached service, in the month of September, 1862. Not having done any duty since, a discharge would benefit the Government and himself."

It appears that a claim for pension was filed in the year 1881, in which the claimant alleged that—

"At Fredericktown, Mo., about the 10th or 12th of April, 1863, he had three ribs broken by falling from his horse while surrounded by guerrillas."

It will be seen that while the certificate of discharge mentions a fall in September, 1862, no allusion is made to any fracture of ribs, while the claimant alleges such an injury occurred in April, 1863.

In 1885 the surgeon who made the medical certificate attached to the discharge, in answer to an inquiry made by the Commissioner of Pensions, says:

"I have to state that I remember the case very distinctly. I made the examination in person, and was thoroughly acquainted with the case. I read the statement on which the application for discharge was based to the man, and he consented to have the papers forwarded as they read. The application for pension is fraudulent, and should not be allowed."

I have omitted references made to the habits of the soldier by this medical officer.

Of course much reliance should be placed upon these statements made by an officer whose business it was to know the exact facts, and who made his certificate at a time when such facts were fresh in his mind. There is no intimation that the surgeon who made the statement referred to was inimical to the soldier or influenced by any unjust motive.

The attempt to impeach the record thus made is based upon affidavits made by a number of the soldier's comrades, who testify to his character and habits, and only three of whom speak of an injury to the soldier caused by falling from his horse. Two of these affiants allege that they were with the claimant on detached duty when his horse took fright and ran away with him, injuring him so that he could not rise and get on his horse without assistance.

So far as these affidavits are before me no date of this occurrence is given, nothing is said as to the character of the injuries, and no reference is made to the condition of the soldier at the time. The third affiant, who speaks of an injury, says that it occurred while on duty on the march from Pilot Knob to Cape Girardeau, in the year 1862 or 1863, and that it was caused by the soldier's being thrown from his horse. He says further that the soldier was not intoxicated at that time.

No mention is made that I can discover of any fracture of the ribs except in the claimant's application for pension made in 1881, seventeen years after his discharge, and in a report of an examining surgeon made in 1882.

With no denial of the soldier's condition, as stated by the surgeon, on the part of the only parties who claim to have been present at the time of the injury, I can not satisfy myself, in view of the other circumstances surrounding this case, that the allegations contained in the claimant's discharge are discredited.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 30, 1888.

MARY SULLIVAN—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 838, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mary Sullivan."

On the 1st day of July, 1886, an act was approved which is an exact copy of the one herewith returned. In pursuance of that act the beneficiary's name was placed upon the pension-rolls.

A second law for the same purpose is, of course, unnecessary.

SILVER BULLION.

Mr. STEWART. If the morning business is through I should like to call up a resolution that I heretofore offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART, April 30, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of the amount of silver bullion offered to the Government each month since the passage of the act of February 28, 1878, under the provisions of said act, and by whom, and at what prices; and also the amount of silver bullion purchased each month during such period, and from whom, and the prices paid therefor; and, further, to inform the Senate if the quotations of India council bills in London enter into the determination to any extent of what is the market price of silver bullion in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there are two theories of finance. One theory is contraction and a single gold standard at all hazards and under all circumstances. The other theory is the use of both gold and silver as a limitation of the quantity of money that shall be in circulation and such reasonable expansion as the precious metals will afford.

I do not propose to reflect upon the motives of the parties who are advocating either of these theories, but I wish to explain their acts and have them understood.

It has been alleged that there is a combination between the Treasury Department and the Bank of England which has existed since the passage of the Bland act, to depress the price of silver, to bring that metal into disrepute, and to force this country to a single gold standard.

It will be observed, and ought to be known of all men, that the United States, or rather the Treasury Department, and the Bank of England are the principal purchasers of silver bullion. In fact they purchase all except what is used in the arts.

The act of 1878 required the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at least $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion per month, not less than that, and not exceeding $4,000,000 worth. It was contemplated by the act that circumstances would arise where it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase more than $2,000,000 worth per month.

I propose to show that circumstances existed which made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury from the first to purchase $4,000,000 worth per month. If that had been done silver would be at par to-day; we would have about $300,000,000 more of circulation; we would not have shrinkage of values, hard times, paralysis of business, general gloom, and low prices of wheat and cotton. I shall show that it has been in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury from the beginning to rescue this country from the financial embarrassment under which it has labored for the last fourteen years.

The Secretary of the Treasury having this power has combined with the Bank of England against the people. The English Government collects its taxes in India in silver rupees—silver coin. It draws what are called council bills against the India revenue and sells them in the market. It has done that for many years. It also buys what silver is used in India and issues therefor council bills. It also buys with these council bills pretty nearly all the silver that is shipped to China and Japan, and consequently the price of silver depends upon these council bills. Whenever the Bank of England wants to put down silver it lowers the price of council bills. If anybody else attempts to ship silver to India the bank puts the council bills up so that the silver will be worth more in London than in India. Several have tried it and failed; it has been given up, and the world now has ceased to make any attempt to compete with the Bank of England in the purchase of silver for Asiatic consumption.

Then the United States and Great Britain, or rather the Treasury Department of the United States and the Bank of England, are the sole purchasers of silver, except what is used in the arts, and can put the price of silver where they please without regard to the laws of supply and demand. Before I am through I shall show why England puts the price of council bills down and puts silver down, and I shall show that she does it for the purpose of obtaining cheap breadstuffs from America and to give India the control of the cotton and wheat markets of the world, and also to enhance the value of bonds and other obligations for the payment of money.

With regard to the increase of these council bills since the passage of the Bland act I will give a statement from the American Interests, of December 15, 1886, published by Dr. Ivan C. Michels:

INDIA COUNCIL BILLS.

In dealing with the silver question it is most important to take into account the amount of India council bills drawn by the India office in England upon the Government of India.

India sends to England an annual tribute of about £15,000,000 sterling, the tribute representing the expenditure on Indian Government account made in England. The manner in which these £15,000,000 sterling are transmitted to the India council is this:

The India council in England draws bills on the government of India, payable in silver at Calcutta, Bombay, or Madras. These bills the India council sells in the London market for so much gold. The purchasers are usually the Indian banks who have remittances to make to India. Thus a banker, wishing to send money to India, can either buy as much silver and ship it, or forward a mercantile bill on India, or an India council draft. An India council draft, therefore, is equivalent to so much silver deposited in India, and accordingly a strong competition always prevails between silver and India council drafts when remittances to India have to be made.

Since the coinage act of 1873, which was enacted by Congress for the benefit of Great Britain, the amount of India council drafts sold in London has shown a remarkable increase.

In 1873 the amount of council bills drawn on India amounted to 142,657,000 rupees, or $68,475,360, while prior to that year, and for the six preceding years, the yearly average was only 82,876,029 rupees, or $39,780,493, rapidly increasing year by year until the enormous sum of 2,077,833,226 rupees were drawn against India from 1874 to 1885, inclusive. If we consider that 2,077,833,226 rupees are equal to $997,359,948.48, or at a yearly average of $83,113,329.04, we find that the increase of drawing council bills on India has beyond cavil or dispute promoted the depreciation in the value of silver bullion.

Then the English commerce is left to itself. The imports England takes from India are much greater than the imports which India takes from England, and a part of the balance has to be paid for in specie, the rest being settled in indirect ways. But the increase in the council bills provided a competing remittance with silver; if a merchant in England wants to make a payment in Calcutta he has the choice either to buy council bills or send out silver, and of course so much less silver was sent. The effect is the greater because the government of India must bring their money home from India, and therefore must sell their bills, whereas silver bullion, like any other commodity, may go to many markets, and may be held when its price falls.

This is the reason for saying that the price of council bills rules the price of silver—not the price of silver that of council bills. It is the price which the more anxious seller must accept that for the moment predominates, and not that which the less anxious can wait for.

Trade in Great Britain has been languishing for many years. The demonetization of silver has precisely the same effect upon the agricultural interests of Great Britain as it has upon the agricultural interests of America. Their manufacturing interests are also depressed.

In 1886 Great Britain appointed a royal commission to inquire into the cause of trade depression. They took a large amount of evidence upon the situation and made a report about a year ago.

In 1887 another royal commission was appointed in Great Britain to inquire into recent changes in the relative values of the precious metals. I have read these reports, and I will give a summary of the result; and after that I shall read some of the evidence contained in those reports. But I will give first what was ascertained by the evidence, and I shall show to what the whole evidence tended.

The evidence confirms substantially the fact that the depreciation of silver has been the result of legislation and not of production; that the demonetization of silver by Germany and the Latin Union and the United States has caused the fall in the price of that metal; that the depression of silver has produced depression in the price of all property from 33 to 35 per cent.; that the fall in prices, particularly of wheat, is very prejudicial to agriculture in England and the United States; but notwithstanding this, it is contended that the demonetization of silver has many advantages, so far as Great Britain is concerned, which overbalance the evil caused by it. They say that England is a creditor nation, and that the demonetization of silver enhances the value of bonds.

They say that England has paid tribute long enough to American cheap lands and cheap produce, and that it is essential for them to build up India. They say that they have already reached a point at which the wheat and cotton of India control the price of those staples throughout the world, and that manufacturers of England will ultimately be benefited by the development of the resources of India, because England has exclusive trade with India. They tell the manufacturers of England they must submit to the present depression of trade for future advantages, when the resources of India are developed by cheap silver. To the agriculturist they say: "If your burdens are too great we will give you a tariff on wheat and corn."

Their contention is that all the world is indebted to England; that she is a creditor nation, and commands the trade of the world. The whole world has to pay tribute to her. She has been compelled to pay tribute to America for breadstuffs and cotton; she proposes to develop the production of those articles in India, which can only be done by cheap silver. Notwithstanding the depression of trade, notwithstanding the ruin of her agricultural interests in England, she will adhere to the single gold standard, enhance the value of bonds by contraction, and develop the resources of India by cheap silver.

These are the general conclusions which the testimony before the royal commission tends to establish.

The Secretary of the Treasury has at all times since the passage of the Bland act contributed to the extent of his power to aid the Bank of England to depress the price of silver. In fact, he assumes that the arbitrary price fixed by council bills is the market value of silver, and purchases silver according to the quotation of council bills in London. He never has in a single instance exercised the discretion given to him by Congress to purchase more than $2,000,000 a month, but has at all times purchased the least possible quantity, so as to leave as much silver as possible in the market and not interfere with the schemes of Great Britain to obtain cheap silver for the benefit of India.

I am aware that the system advocated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to maintain which the whole power of every administration has been exerted since the demonetization of silver, is the policy of bondholders, creditors, and money dealers; that they are in favor of the single gold standard because it enhances the value of all obligations for the payment of money, and makes money dearer and property cheaper; that the present Secretary of the Treasury is acting with the financial combination to which he belongs. I have no fault to find with him personally. He is simply the agent put into the Treasury Department to carry out the views of the money powers who placed him there.

I now call attention to some English views developed by the royal commission.

Mr. R. H. Inglis Palgrave, Fellow of the Royal Society, was examined before the commission. He is a man of great learning. He exhibited some statistics as to the production of gold which I wish to call to the attention of those who desire to maintain the gold standard. He gave the yearly average of the production of gold, according to Dr. Soetbeer, which is as follows:

1851–1860	£28,650,000
1861–1870	26,600,000
1871–1880	23,000,000
1881–1884	19,500,000

Gold available for the supply of coin—estimates of yearly average, by Dr. Soetbeer:

1851–1860	£22,780,000
1861–1870	14,060,000
1871–1880	10,255,000
1881–1884	4,050,000

From the above tables it will be seen that the product of gold is constantly decreasing, while the amount used in the arts is increasing, and that the policy of the single gold standard is perpetual contraction and constant fall of the price of property and rise in the value of money.

The production of silver is not in excess of the present demand for that metal. Mr. David A. Wells, the life-long monometallist, has at last discovered that there is no danger of a flood of silver. In the May number of the Popular Science Monthly he says:

> Something of inference respecting the economic changes of the future may be warranted from a study of the past. It may, for example, be safely predicted that whatever of economic disturbance has been due to a change in the relative value of silver to gold will ultimately, and probably at no very distant period, be terminated by a restoration of the bullion price of the former metal to the rates (60 to 61 pence per ounce) that prevailed for many years prior to the year 1873. The reasons which warrant such an opinion are briefly as follows:
> Silver is the only suitable coin medium for countries of comparatively low prices, low wages, and limited exchanges, like India, China, Central and South America, which represent about three-fifths of the population of the world, or about a thousand millions of people. Civilization in most of these countries, through the advent of better means of production and exchange, is rapidly advancing, necessitating a continually increasing demand for silver as money, as well as of iron for tools and machinery.
> Generations also will pass before the people of such countries will begin to economize money by the use to any extent of its representatives, paper and credit; under such circumstances a scarcity, rather than a superabundant supply of silver, in the world's market, is the outlook for the future; inasmuch as a comparatively small per capita increase in the use of silver by such vast numbers would not only rapidly absorb any existing surplus, but possibly augment demand in excess of any current supply.* The true economic policy of a country like the United States, which is a large producer and seller of silver, would therefore seem to be, to seek to facilitate such a result, by removing all obstacles in the way of commerce between itself and silver-using countries, in order that through increased traffic and consequent prosperity the demand for silver on the part of the latter might be promoted.
> The situation suggests what is reported to have been contemplated, namely, the formation of a syndicate like the so-called recent French syndicate in copper, for intercepting the current market supplies of silver by speculative purchases and vast holdings, with a view of compelling an immediate rise in the bullion price of this metal.

POWER OF ABSORPTION OF SILVER IN INDIA.

As to the imports of silver into India since the demonetization of silver in the United States, in 1873, the results are almost incredible.

According to the returns published by Hon. D. Barbour, financial secretary to the Government of India, hence an indisputable official authority, in his work on the "Theory of Bi-Metallism," on page 108, the imports of silver into India were: 1872–'73, 7,000,000 rupees, increasing in 1873–'74 to 25,000,000 rupees, and so on until in 1878, when the purchase of silver bullion in the United States was made by law at the "market value," it reached the enormous sum of 147,000,000 rupees.

The official "Blue Book" of the British Government for India, page 25, gives the following imports of silver into India:

	Rupees.
1881–'82	64,863,889
1882–'83	83,580,218
1883–'84	74,085,065
1884–'85	91,160,254
1885–'86	101,212,496
Total for five years	414,541,922

Equal to $198,981,122, or at an average of $39,796,225 per annum.

When we consider that during the same period of five years, 1881–'82 to 1885–'86, the production of silver in the United States amounted to $236,400,000, and India alone was able to absorb $198,981,122 worth, it is no wonder that the fight for the further depression of silver is so desperately carried on by the enemies of this country and to the profit of India and the British Government. The profit alone to Great Britain upon the imports of silver bullion at the average rate of $1.10 per ounce for these five years amounts to $30,681,122.

Nothing has been done in this country to relieve the contraction resulting from the demonetization of silver except the passage of the Bland act. On the contrary, every effort has been made by the Treasury Department, or rather the gold syndicate through the agency of the Treasury Department, to manipulate the currency for the benefit of speculators and dealers in bonds.

I have prepared statements showing the amount of circulation in 1865, 1879, and 1888, which show enormous and continued contraction. They are as follows:

*According to statements submitted to the royal (English) commission on trade depression, "The quantity of pure silver used for coinage purposes, during the fourteen years ending 1884, was about 18 per cent. greater than the total production during that period; and there are other estimates which place the consumption at a still higher figure. It is to be remembered that the coinage demand is fed from other sources than the annual output of the mines. It is supplied to some extent by the melting down of old coinage. Allowing for this, however, the evidence of statistics goes to show that the coinage demand for the metal is, and has been, sufficient to absorb the whole of the annual supply that is left free after the consumption in the arts and manufactures has been supplied; and this conclusion is supported by the fact that nowhere throughout the world has there been any accumulation of uncoined stocks of the metal."—London Economist.

The $162,000,000 of national-bank circulation will soon be retired. The question is already presented as to what shall take the place of the currency so retired. The national banks want the public debt made perpetual in order that they may control the circulation. The people want both precious metals used and no more national-bank issues, and demand that the United States shall no longer surrender its sovereign power to issue money to private corporations.

The statement that the circulation is increasing is a sad mistake, as will be seen by the foregoing tables. It is constantly growing less per capita and dearer, while property is growing cheaper. Much of the money outside of the Treasury is hoarded, because confidence in business is destroyed, money is growing dearer, and property cheaper. Interest is also falling for want of confidence, and also because enterprising men dare not borrow money and invest it in property which is shrinking in value. Low rate of interest is an invariable indication that times are hard and confidence is weak.

Prudent men will not borrow money in times like these to engage in any kind of business involving the purchase of property. Everybody knows that money and obligations for the payment of money, where the security is undoubted, is the only profitable investment.

I propose now to give you English opinions of what we are doing. I will first quote from a remark made in June, 1886, at an important meeting of the British and Colonial Chamber of Commerce, in London, at which there was an animated discussion of the silver question and its bearings upon the commerce of India, by Sir Robert N. Fowler, M. P., a London banker and an ex-lord mayor, who said—

That the effect of the depreciation of silver must finally be the ruin of the wheat and cotton industries of America, and be the development of India as the chief wheat and cotton exporter of the world.

I will read a few more extracts from the testimony taken by the royal commission. I first read from the testimony of James Shield Nicholson, professor of political economy in the University of Edinburgh, and a very learned man, as his testimony amply attests. He says:

First of all, with regard to the fall in the gold price of silver, will you state what in your opinion has been the cause of that fall?

Briefly expressed, I should say it was due to the demonetization of silver by several nations.

That is to say, to a diminution of the demand?

Yes. I do not think—that is to say, that the change that has undoubtedly taken place in the supply would in itself have had any effect upon the ratio at all.

There has been some increase in the supply of silver?

Yes, so I understand; but still, judging from the effects, in former times especially, I do not think that the increase in production would have really had any effect in disturbing the ratio.

H. R. Grenfell, ex-governor and director of the Bank of England, was also examined and testified at great length, and displayed great learning and experience. He was asked many questions; I will read a few extracts from his testimony:

At present gold is worth about twenty times as much as silver, and you propose by law to give it fifteen and a half times the value of silver. Is not that going against the natural law?

Before you can say what the relative value of gold and silver is you must demonetize gold, and when you have done that you will have some other thing than the money standard to tell you what the relative value is. At the present time, the privilege of the law having been conferred on gold and taken away from silver, the ratio is 20 or 21 to 1, but you can not say what the natural ratio would be unless you demonetized gold first.

Again:

Well, then, since that time it is a fact, is it not, that the gold price of silver has gone down in the market?

Yes.

If that is so, how would you account for the fall in the price of silver?

Because the demand for gold has been much greater.

But is not this demand for silver a very large one?

The demand for gold is unlimited. By the Bland act that of silver is limited.

He calls attention to the Bland act. He explains the reason why the demand under the Bland act has not put up silver, because it is a limited demand. If there is any left over, of course it would affect the market quotation. The same witness again testifies:

I may take it, then, that you consider beyond doubt that prices are influenced by an expansion or contraction of the volume of legal-tender money, and that they would rise and fall with that volume?

Yes, that is my opinion.

* * * * * * *

You said, I think, that you agreed with Mr. Gibbs, generally speaking, in his evidence; therefore perhaps I need hardly ask you whether you trace the disturbance in values to the legislation of Germany and subsequent legislation abroad in demonetizing silver since 1873?

I consider the action of the closing of the mints to silver in France following on the demonetization in Germany was the main cause.

Then, as a matter of fact, in your opinion the entire scale of prices has been suddenly affected since 1873 by the fact of that foreign legislation?

Yes.

Again:

I think you said you had no fear whatever that the operation of the Bland bill was likely to be suspended?

From what I hear I think it is almost impossible that it should be suspended.

But supposing it was suspended, do I gather from you that the effect of that suspension in your opinion would be to cause a still greater fall in the value of silver?

Certainly, and in the exchange with India.

And that all the evils which arise from the present system, in your opinion, would be proportionately increased?

Certainly.

Again:

I would ask you now, after looking at the figures that I have given you, to consider how you think it is that that scarcity of gold, or the increased demand for gold, in proportion to the supply, has arisen?

I would answer that I believe the scarcity of gold and the fall of prices to be absolutely convertible terms, and that there is no other meaning in the appreciation of gold and the fall in prices; they appear to me to be absolutely synonymous.

Then I would ask you another question, whether prices do not depend on the quantity of the commodities, as well as upon the quantity of gold?

That is quite compatible with the other; all I mean to say is that the two things are absolutely the same. The appreciation of gold and fall of prices are absolutely synonymous to me.

Again:

Q. The amount of gold and silver which has been dug out of the earth.

A. As long as the mints were ready to coin either metal it did not matter how the production varied.

Q. Then you think that it would have made no difference if the foreign mint regulations had remained as they were; that the production of silver in the world has increased from the date of the great gold discoveries from £8,000,000 to £25,000,000 a year, while the production of gold has fallen from £30,000,000 a year to about £20,000,000?

A. Upon the figures you give me prices ought to have risen under the old arrangements. The variations of the supply in quantity of gold and silver between 1873 and 1884 have varied much less than they did during the time that prices did not change at all.

Again:

Would the bi-metallic law, do you think, if it were introduced as we are proposing, would it have the effect of steadying that fall of wages?

I think it would create a greater demand for labor in the manufacturing districts, and I think it would stay the fall in the agricultural districts.

Again:

Then I gather your opinion to be that the action of Germany and other countries which have adopted the gold standard has affected the relative values of gold and silver by increasing the demand for gold and decreasing that for silver?

Yes, for the purpose of coinage.

Here is Mr. Gibbs, another ex-governor and director of the Bank of England, a learned man, and his opinions may be of some value:

Will you tell the commission how you understand the Gresham law to operate in practice?

If two kinds of money circulate in a country, the cheapest will drive out the dearest. That is the "Gresham law." But what is meant by cheapest and what by dearest is not always clearly understood, nor how the driving out is to be accomplished, nor what is the effect on the country so situated.

Then he goes on to explain that when one country uses more silver or more gold in its circulation than another country the coin will flow from one to the other; that which is undervalued will go to the country where it is overvalued.

Here is Professor Nicholson again, who was recalled:

I believe you are of opinion that a variation in the relative value of the two standards, such as has occurred in recent years, would give, for a time at any rate, an advantage to the producer in silver countries, and would especially affect industries in gold and silver countries which produce the same article for sale in the same markets?

It seems to me it would be so, unless silver prices rose.

The variation would specially affect industries in the gold and silver countries which produced the same article for sale in the same markets?

Yes.

Is it your opinion that this variation in the relation between the two standards in recent years has been sufficient to relatively stimulate production in the silver countries and to cause a corresponding depression in gold countries?

As far as I can gather, the prices in silver-using countries have not moved upwards, and therefore it would follow that the gold prices must have moved downwards, of these articles, and so there would be a depression in the gold-using countries from that cause through the fall in prices.

I suppose this relative stimulus and depression would only be temporary, and must cease if silver ceases to fall relatively to gold.

Yes, so far as that cause is concerned.

If silver continued to fall relatively to gold the stimulus and depression would continue as long as silver continued to fall?

Of course silver can not go on being depreciated forever; it must come to a stop some time, and then the stimulus and depression would cease.

And if silver rose relatively to gold you would have the opposite effect—a temporary stimulus in gold countries and a temporary depression in silver countries?

Yes, that seems to me to follow.

I now call attention to a witness who has visited this country, and who has given great attention to the subject of finance, named J. Barr Robertson, and I call particular attention to his testimony, because it is so pertinent to the question. He says:

Let me suppose now that two gentlemen each invested £100,000 in the period 1870-'74, but that the one invested in consuls and the other bought an estate with a rental from crops corresponding to the purchase-money. To-day the owner of the consols has his £100,000 intact, with a purchasing power over commodities as compared with the time he made the investment of £143,000, and he has his £3,000 a year, with an increased purchasing power of £1,200. On the other hand, the owner of the estate could not sell it for £70,000, and yet if the volume of money had been kept up from 1876 till the present time, as it was from 1866 to 1875, there can be no doubt that his property would, under average circumstances, have been worth £100,000 to-day, and would have been yielding a corresponding rental. This amount of depreciation is due solely to the mediatization produced by a contracting currency, which has given to the owner of the consols part of the value of the other gentleman's estate.

The farmer and manufacturer have had to accept continually over the last ten years lower and lower prices for the benefit of the owner of obligations in figures, to whom the farmer, the manufacturer, and the producer generally had to gradually give up their wealth and become themselves impoverished.

A careful investigation of this question would probably show that the mediatization of wealth from the producing classes and those allied with them to the holders of securities and the possessors of mortgages, annuities, fixed incomes, etc., has taken place in the United Kingdom in the last twelve years to at least £2,000,000,000, equal to about $10,000,000,000.

Suppose two gentlemen in the United States in 1863–'64 each invested $10,000, one in a farm yielding net 6 per cent. per annum, and the other in United States bonds, at 50 cents on the dollar which would equal $20,000 in bonds. The investment in bonds would have yielded $1,200 per annum for, say, fourteen years, making $16,800, and since the same was funded to the present time—ten years—$800 per annum = $8,000. Total interest = $24,800. Principal $20,000, 26 per cent. premium = $25,200. Principal, interest, and premium to date of the bonds = $50,000. The man who invested his money in the farm and was subjected at once to contraction and hard times for the purpose of enhancing the value of his neighbor's bonds, is very differently situated. By hard work he has barely made a living, and is in the best of luck if he has not been compelled to mortgage his farm to support his family, and the value of the farm for which he paid $10,000 has been reduced by the process of contraction of the currency nearly one-half and could not now be sold with the improvements for more than $6,000.

This process has been going on until the wealth of the nation has been transferred from the people to the various classes of bondholders.

I desire to reproduce an extract from the St. Louis Republican read in the Senate a few days ago by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]:

It would be instructive to have the exact figures showing farm mortgages in the United States. There is no Federal law nor general law in the States for collecting the statistics, and they can therefore only be estimated. A correspondent of the New York Times, writing from Gypsum City, Kans., taking for a basis the recent statement that one-half the farms in Michigan are mortgaged, makes the following estimate for the ten leading Western States:

In Ohio	$701,000,000
In Indiana	398,000,000
In Illinois	620,000,000
In Wisconsin	250,000,000
In Michigan	350,000,000
In Minnesota	175,000,000
In Iowa	351,000,000
In Nebraska	140,000,000
In Kansas	$200,000,000
In Missouri	237,000,000
Total farm mortgages in the ten States	3,422,000,000

This aggregate is so enormous that we are inclined to think the respective sums in the States are overestimated. Still, it is a well-known fact that in the older and more prosperous States of the West, every fourth or third farm is mortgaged, and, in the newer ones, two out of three are in that condition, and the bulk of these claims is held in the prosperous and rich industrial States of the East. The insurance companies of the little city of Hartford, Conn., own $70,000,000 in Western farm mortgages; and the loan companies of Boston hold $76,000,000 more. Here is $146,000,000 in two cities to begin with, and it is certain that if complete returns could be had from all the nine industrial States the aggregate would be immense, probably one-half the assessed value of Western farms.

As the average annual net earnings of farming in the United States are only about 3½ per cent. on the capital invested, while the interest charged on these mortgages is 7 to 9 per cent., it is clear that the mass of farmers can not pay their debts, and that, sooner or later, their farms will fall into the hands of their creditors, and the great money-lending corporations of the rich manufacturing States will own fully one-half the Western States.

The above table must be an exaggeration, but the lowest estimate I have seen of farm mortgages in the Mississippi Valley was the enormous sum of $1,200,000,000.

These mortgages are pressing very heavily. The national debt is a very small part of the debt of this country. The United States has in it more bonds of railroads than any other country ever had. We have built railroads for the last twenty-five or thirty years with greater rapidity than any other country by our credit system with bonds. The people are compelled to pay on their freight the interest on these bonds; and by means of these railroad bonds and these mortgages and the national debt and State and corporation debts, and private debts, combined, more than half the property of the country has been transferred from the debtors to the creditors by the process of contraction, by the process of attempting to reach the gold standard. Just look at the colossal fortunes held by individuals in New York—look at the Vanderbilts and Goulds and others who have accumulated hundreds of millions by manipulation of money and the contraction of the currency.

I will introduce a few more extracts. I read from a gentleman who was examined before the royal commission, by the name of T. Comber, who was largely engaged in trade in Manchester and Liverpool and Bombay, and appears to be a man of great intelligence:

What are the reasons why the fall has specially stimulated the exports and imports of India and would not do so in other silver countries?

In my opinion it has given the Indian producer an advantage over his competitors in other countries in this way, as the exchange falls the rupee prices, other things being equal, rise. The cost of production which he incurs in consequence of the fixed settlement in India, or, in other words, the rent he pays, does not advance, and if he employs labor, the wages also are slow to advance, and as matter of fact they have not yet advanced as much as the produce has. Under those circumstances I think the producer in India is at a decided advantage over his competitors, whether in England or in America, and to that extent I believe that it has stimulated exports.

Again:

As matter of fact, has the Indian price risen?

Not much; but it is immaterial, I think, in his competition with other countries whether he has obtained a rise in price, or whether he has avoided a fall in price which his competitors have had to suffer. I should like to quote the Viceroy of India dispatch on that point, if you would allow me. It is dated the 2d February, 1886, paragraph 13. I think it is addressed to Viscount Cross: "We would call your lordship's special attention to the fact that the Indian cultivator of wheat and cotton appears to have actually gained, while the English and American producer of these commodities has suffered by the fall in the rate of exchange."

That is the view of the governing authority of the British mint. I now quote from Mr. H. L. Raphael, a bullion broker and financier, and a very sharp witness:

Statistics would hardly forward us, because I think that every one will allow that, perhaps with the exception of coffee, which, owing to a special cause went up last year very considerably from the fear of a short crop, every other article of food has been steadily and persistently declining; and this decline has been contemporaneous with the decline of silver. The cause of our agricultural distress, I believe, has been rightly ascribed to the competition of large tracts of land in the United States which pay no rent, but there is no doubt that, as regards the agricultural interest, the decline in silver has had a very damaging effect; in fact, it has been the finishing stroke to a long course of suffering, originating in the competition from free land in the United States. I do not question this agricultural distress being a serious matter for England, because in a political point of view it drives our laborers into towns, where they become enervated, and no longer form the back-bone of our fighting power.

However, it might be wise to take the duty off tea and put it on corn, but we are not here to discuss that matter to-day. I only mention this point to explain what appears to me to be the absurdity, that in order to give relief to agriculture to a certain extent, we should adopt a supposed cure, namely, bimetallism, which would raise the price, not only of wheat, but nearly every article 30 or 35 per cent. But take wheat alone, which we are obliged to import in enormous quantities, you would adopt a ruinous course for the sake of relieving our agricultural population which might be relieved just as easily, say, by taking the duty off tea and putting it on corn. But, however, whether you do that or not, in order to give a certain amount of relief, you propose to make the whole of the population pay considerably more for the food that they consume.

Now, the wealth of England, other than the accrued wealth, namely, the interest which she draws from her investments abroad, consists, as we all know, in her iron, her coal, and in the manufacture of iron and other metals, and in a great quantity of other manufactures, such as cotton, wool, jute, and the like. If, by adopting bimetallism and paying foreign nations dearer for our food, which would be the inevitable result, is there such a certainty that they would buy more of our manufactures? If we paid America 8s. per quarter more for her wheat and corn, is it so certain that she would take more iron from us in return? Her manufactures, as you know, have been so stimulated by protection, which on iron is 50 to 60 per cent., that to-day she can manufacture for her own use the sufficient quantity. But even if she is obliged to import, it does not follow that she will come to England because we paid her more for our food.

I think that is a very good lesson for Americans. Again, I call attention to the testimony of Mr. Herman Schmidt, a discount broker, and a very intelligent man. He says:

I do not quite understand your view of the origin of this disturbance and difficulty. You say that it was due to what is called, whether correctly or not, the demonetization of silver by the Latin Union and by Germany, that made the value of silver lower? The demonetization of silver caused one portion of the demand to be dried up, to be closed, and a demand which always existed at a certain ratio, and from that moment of course silver could fluctuate to anything.

Again:

Now, would you kindly explain to me in what way you consider that a fall in the price of silver affects the price of wheat in this country?

Because wheat can be imported into this country at so much less; can be laid down in this country at so much less.

He explains more at length how the fall in the price of silver benefits India, and builds up the resources of that country.

Here is the testimony of W. Fowler, author of a work on Appreciation of Gold:

I admit you have given a number of very powerful arguments against it.

That is against remonetizing silver.

I only want to arrive at the possible objections when it is done?

I think, also, that it would tend to discourage the exports from India, and thereby lessen the power of India to take our manufactures, and so would materially injure a large class of our people. According to the argument that I understand you to have used to-day, you lay great stress upon this export bounty. If it be so, it leads to considerable increase of the exports from India, and therefore a large increase in the exports from England to India, and Mr. O'Conor says, if you have great export you must have great import, and that is the universal rule of commerce—goods go against goods.

One more extract and I am done, and to this I wish to call particular attention. It is the testimony of Mr. Daniel Watney, who has given special attention and written on the subject of the relations of the two metals, and I call the particular attention of Americans to this testimony. It is short and pointed:

Why should a bimetallic convention say, at 20 to 1, it would break down, if all the important nations joined in it?

I should have to suppose that everybody is wise to suppose that it would remain. I can not suppose that everybody is wise. Just think of the folly of the United States when they were a debtor nation in adopting a gold coinage. They knew nothing about currency matters; they did not know that it was going to increase their debt enormously.

Is the United States a debtor nation?

I call it so.

What leads you to suppose that?

Well, I believe there are enormous quantities of stocks held in this country for railways and all sorts of industrial enterprises for which dividends are received in this country. Besides, if you look at their imports and exports you will find that invariably they are a greater exporting than an importing nation.

You are aware that almost all her public debt is held in America?

Oh, but that is very small in comparison with the other debts of the United States, so I believe.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the demonetization of silver on some of our industries. I am aware of the fact that when I speak of its injury to the silver interest the enemies of silver appear to take great pleasure, and say, "Of course he is a silver man," and consequently I have left that question out of my argument invariably, and have confined myself to showing how it injures other interests; but I think that in the greatest silver-producing country in the world I might say one word against the robbery of the silver miners.

The silver miners of the United States have suffered a loss on discount by the demonetization of silver of over $80,000,000. This terrible and unjust tax has been imposed upon them to satisfy the greed of the creditor class, and it is refreshing to note with what complacency opulent members of the gold ring endure the disasters which they have brought upon their neighbors.

In 1873 and prior to the demonetization of silver, the silver dollar, since its first coinage in 1793, was always at a premium; in 1874 it was at par. Since 1874 the losses to the silver miners were as follows:

Year.	Production.	Average price per ounce.	Loss.
1875	$31,700,000	$1.27	$712,000
1876	38,800,000	1.26	1,126,000
1877	39,800,000	1.14	5,660,000
1878	45,200,000	1.18	4,254,000
1879	40,800,000	1.13	5,318,000
1880	39,200,000	1.11	5,678,000
1881	43,000,000	1.13	5,507,000
1882	46,800,000	1.10	7,200,000
1883	46,200,000	1.10	7,106,000
1884	48,800,000	1.09	7,951,400
1885	51,600,000	1.08⅛	8,327,000
1886	50,896,124	1.05	9,788,624
1887	50,389,950	.98½	12,022,950
Total	646,336,074		80,679,974

By this loss of $80,679,974 to the miners of silver in the United States the United States Government has profited by purchasing silver bullion at market value $36,152,332.

I now call attention to the tremendous loss of the wheat and cotton producers of the United States occasioned by the demonetization of silver.

Decline in prices for wheat and cotton since the demonetization of silver in 1873.

[Export prices from 1872 to 1879, the resumption of specie payments, reduced from currency to coin prices.]

Years.	Wheat, per bushel.	Cotton, per pound.

In 1872 we exported 1,957,314 bales of cotton, equal to 782,925,600 pounds, for which we received $152,670,492; while in 1887 we exported 4,477,582 bales, or 2,161,435,833 pounds, for which we received $204,423,785.

We therefore gave 1,478,510,233 pounds more cotton in 1887, yet we received only $51,753,293 more than we did in 1872, prior to the demonetization of silver in 1873. In fact these 1,478,510,233 pounds of cotton which we have in excess exported are in reality double the quantity of the whole amount exported in 1872, and yet instead of $278,309,495 in excess of 1872 we have received only $51,753,293 more than in 1872, thus leaving a loss to the planter and exporter of American cotton of $226,556,202 on one year's crop.

To understand this loss more clearly, it becomes necessary to compare the prices paid in India for cotton with those of the United States. The first authentic export prices from official returns are those of 1874.

From the foregoing table it will be seen that the silver rupee has not depreciated in India, but as the market value in London for silver is regulated by the price at which council bills on India are issued in London, with the decline in silver in England the price for cotton declines in the United States. As to wheat the same causes produce the same effect on our prices.

Average price for wheat in India for the twelve years equal to 4 rupees 2½ annas per hundred weight, and if silver at par is equal to $1.76 per hundred weight of 112 pounds, or $1.05½ per bushel of 60 pounds; but in that period council bills were issued at an average of 1*s.* 6*d.* per rupee, which reduced the price equal to $1.33 per hundred weight of 112 pounds, or the bushel of 60 pounds equal to 79½ cents.

The exports of wheat from India since the demonetization of silver in 1873 have advanced from 735,485 bushels in that year to 41,588,235 bushels in 1887; while the United States since the enactment of the law of February 28, 1878, which provides that the purchase of silver bullion shall be at the market value of silver in London, our exports from 153,252,795 bushels in 1878–'79, have dwindled down to 57,759,209 in 1885–'86, while during the same period India has increased her exports from 4,109,495 bushels to 39,312,969 bushels—almost 900 per cent.

I have read the testimony taken before these royal commissioners, and it all tends to the same point, and every sensible man will admit that the fall in the price of wheat and cotton was produced by the demonetization of silver. Last year the cotton planters lost on their crop by this demonetization and this fall in the price of cotton $226,556,202, as is already shown. The table also shows the decline of the wheat interest of the country year after year with the decline in the price of silver side by side, and the price of wheat and cotton have gone down with the price of silver until the exportation of wheat and cotton from the United States have dwindled down both in price and quantity, to such an extent as to prostrate those industries.

While the exports of the United States have diminished, as these tables show, the exports of wheat and cotton from India have increased, so that they command the market and fix the price of those articles in Europe, as we have seen from the testimony I have read.

We have a country with boundless resources, but no money. We have lower prices for wheat and cotton than have prevailed for one hundred years. We have built up colossal fortunes by the enhancement of bonds. Our rich men are as opulent as any on earth, while our farmers, mechanics, and laborers have lost much of their thrift and independence.

If the Secretary of the Treasury had bought $4,000,000 a month of silver since the passage of the Bland act all this would have been averted, and that is easy to demonstrate.

India imports over $39,000,000 of silver per annum. The United States produces in round numbers about $50,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury purchased last year $24,000,000 worth of silver bullion at the market price. It required over $30,000,000, nearly $34,000,000, at the standard value of silver, to supply the amount purchased with the $24,000,000, on account of the discount. We exported about $20,000,000. If the Secretary of the Treasury had bought $4,000,000 a month it would have been necessary to have imported into this country from $8,000,000 to $14,000,000—$14,000,000 if the price had not been raised. What a boon that would have been, and how it would have revived the drooping industries of the country! The Secretary of the Treasury well knew, but he would not heed. Why did he not, when he saw the distress, buy more silver and put up the price? No; he did not do that. He allowed England to fix the price by her council bills.

My resolution is to call for the exact information. He allowed them to depress our wheat, and our cotton, and destroy our industries and impoverish the producing classes of this country. He allowed England to fix the price of silver without attempting to raise his hand, but bought only the minimum, accumulated the funds in the Treasury, and complained of the surplus. When the President's message came it was suggested that the power to purchase bonds being in an appropriation bill, it was desirable to have Congress express itself affirmatively on the subject. A bill for that purpose passed the House and came to the Senate. The Senate said, yes, you can buy bonds; but if you do and the national-bank currency is retired thereby, you shall buy silver, so as to prevent further contraction.

That bill was returned to the House of Representatives with a request for a conference on the amendment, but no notice has been taken of that request. We have never heard from it since; but we did see go through the other House a resolution saying that it was the opinion of the House that the President had the power to purchase bonds, and with that indorsement, without any new law, the Secretary of the Treasury is to-day purchasing bonds at from 25 to 26½ per cent. premium. He is giving to these people who bought bonds at 50 cents on the dollar and have received in interest about 130 cents on the dollar, not only the principal, but $26 on the hundred premium, all in gold. These bonds were originally payable in lawful money, but afterwards made payable by legislation in coin, and by the demonetization of silver made payable in gold. The effect of these purchases is to contract the currency by retiring the national-bank notes, making times more and more stringent while he refuses to exercise his power to buy silver and relieve the money market. Would he do this if there was any danger that the great money trust of New York would be unable to dictate the Presidential nominee in both political parties and thereby deny to the people the right to vote upon the question of gold and silver and prosperity, or gold alone and hard times?

He has had the power all the time to relieve the money market by buying silver, but he has not exercised it. On the contrary he has exerted every power conferred on him by legislation, dictated by a great money trust, to confer enormous privileges on a favored class of money changers. No class of men on earth ever possessed such privileges before. To-day the national banks are using over $60,000,000 of the people's money without paying a cent of interest. The Administration speculates in bonds, putting up the premium, while the farmers are crushed to the earth without money to pay their mortgages.

I want to avoid saying anything unkind of this Administration. It is following in the footsteps of Republican administrations. It has been the policy of the gold-contraction party, the bond absorption party, the grand money trust of this country, which dominates both political parties, to contract money, to enrich the bondholders and impoverish the people. It has been the policy of the Administrations, whether Republican or Democratic, from the beginning. The time will come when the voice of the people will be heard and somebody except an agent of an overgrown monopoly will be in the Treasury Department to act for the interest of the people of the United States and not to do the bidding of Great Britain to destroy our prosperity, to ruin our products, to depreciate everything produced here, to increase the wealth of bondholders in England and bondholders in the United States and to augment the wealth of England's possessions and break down our own. We will some time—when it will come I do not know, but the time will come when we shall have an American policy, when we shall have somebody at the head of affairs who will hear the voice of all the people.

Ever since the passage of the Bland act there has been a majority in both Houses of Congress in favor of the complete and absolute remonetization of silver, but it is stopped at the other end of the Avenue. Presidential vetoes and Federal patronage stifle the voice of the people's representatives in Congress. The Bland act alone triumphed over a veto, but it has been robbed of nearly all its virtue by the refusal by the Treasury Department to execute it fairly according to the intent and meaning of Congress. We have agents sent to Europe to inquire what the bondholders there want; and who bring arguments from them for American consumption. The arguments our agents claim they make are not the same that we find in the testimony they give when testifying before their own commissions in their own country, as I have shown. They admit that their policy is destructive of us. They say that is their purpose; that they will destroy their own agriculture or protect it by tariffs for the purpose of putting down wheat and cotton they are forced to buy from us, and that they will build up India, open up trade there, and benefit their own manufacturers in that way.

It is incredible to me that any man born on American soil or naturalized under American law can be so perverse, so deaf to the voice of the people, the voice of the two Houses of Congress, the voice of common justice, as to deny to the people of the Union both silver and gold without limit and without stint. I do not wish to cast special reflection upon anybody. I am dealing with a system that was inaugurated years ago.

From beginning to end I am at war with that policy, and I want a representative in the White House with an American policy, who is in favor of American industry, of equal rights, a champion of the people and not of the bondholders or English monopolists.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to hear the resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of the amount of silver bullion offered to the Government each month since the passage of the act of February 28, 1878, under the provisions of said act, and by whom, and at what prices; and also the amount of silver bullion purchased each month during such period, and from whom, and the prices paid therefor; and, further, to inform the Senate if the quotations of India Council bills in London enter into the determination to any extent of what is the market price of silver bullion in the United States.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution, coming over from yesterday under objection, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SPOONER April 30, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby directed to send to the Senate, at as early date as is practicable, full information as to employés in the customs service at the port of New York, in the offices of the collector, the naval officer, surveyor, and appraisers at said port, all of said information, as hereinafter detailed, to cover the time between March 4, 1885, and April 30, 1888.

First. Number, names, and official designations of employés removed or resigned upon request since March 4, 1885.

Second. Number, names, and official designation of employés appointed since March 4, 1885.

Third. Number and designation of offices and official positions coming within the classified service created since March 4, 1885.

Fourth. Number and designation of offices and official positions coming below or outside the classified service created since March 4, 1885.

Fifth. Number and designation of offices and official positions coming within the classified service abolished or left vacant since March 4, 1885.

Sixth. Number and designation of offices and official positions coming below or outside the classified service abolished or left vacant since March 4, 1885.

Seventh. Total number of employés, with name and official designation of each, in the customs service March 4, 1885.

Eighth. Total number of employés, with name and official designation of each, in the customs service April 30, 1888.

Ninth. Number, names, and official designations of heads of divisions in the customs service March 4, 1885.

Tenth. Number, names, and official designations of heads of divisions in the customs service removed or resigned upon request since March 4, 1885.

Eleventh. Number, names, and official designations of heads of divisions in the customs service appointed since March 4, 1885.

Twelfth. Number, names, and official designations of temporary employés (excepting day laborers) appointed since March 4, 1885, with the date of appointment and terms of service of each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I see no objection to the giving by the Department of the information called for. The seventh and eighth clauses will cause an immense amount of work, and it seems to me will be entirely useless.

Seventh. Total number of employés, with name and official designation of each, in the customs service March 4, 1885.

That will include the writing out of several thousand names and will necessarily consume a great deal of time. It is also contained in the Official Register, which was published July 1, 1887. And then the eighth item is:

Eighth. Total number of employés, with name and official designation of each, in the customs service April 30, 1888.

Which will be a partial repetition. I suggest to the Senator to leave out these two clauses, and the other sections will get all the information in regard to removals and everything of that kind that may be desired.

Mr. SPOONER. I am content to have those clauses eliminated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that those sections be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to strike out the seventh and eighth subdivisions, as follows:

7. Total number of employés, with name and official designation of each, in the customs service March 4, 1885.

8. Total number of employés, with name and official designation of each, in the customs service April 30, 1888.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPOONER. I have accepted the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is accepted and the resolution is so modified.

Mr. SPOONER. There will be a change in the number of items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course that change will be made, without objection. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate lay aside informally the pending business and proceed to the consideration of Calendar number 1078, House joint resolution 56.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that is done I wish to suggest that as at 2 o'clock the special order will come up, I want to ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, which had the right of way to-day but has been laid aside, as the Senate understands, may be taken up, and then I shall have no objection to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw my request for unanimous consent until that is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that to-morrow after the conclusion of morning business Senate bill 1430 be taken up for consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. Is that the land-grant forfeiture bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The Chair hears no objection and it is so ordered.

CASTLE ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1078, being the joint resolution (H. Res. 56) authorizing the use and improvement of Castle Island, in Boston Harbor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That permission be, and is hereby, granted to the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, through its park commissioners, to improve and beautify Castle Island, situated in said city, and belonging to the United States, in connection with a public park to be laid out on land adjoining and connecting with said island, with the right to said city of Boston to make such excavations and fillings and erect and maintain such structures as the Secretary of War may from time to time approve: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to pass any title in said island, but that the ownership and control of the said grounds shall remain entirely in the United States, and shall be subject to such changes and uses for military or other purposes as the Secretary of War may direct.

Mr. PLATT. If the resolution is being read for information, we do not get much information, because we are entirely unable to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is entirely correct, and the Chair must insist that there must be order in the galleries.

Mr. HOAR. The city of Boston is laying out a very extensive and costly system of public parks, and immediately adjacent to the land occupied by that system of parks is Castle Island, which contains an old fort that, I understand, is of very little value to the fortification of the city of Boston in view of the modern improvements in the means of attack. This resolve simply authorizes the park commissioners to use it as part of their system of parks, subject entirely to the control of the Secretary of War, and with a provision that the city shall never get any title and that it shall always be subject to such uses as the Secretary of War shall direct hereafter. It is a mere permission for the people to extend their walks and drives on the island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EMPORIA, KANS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1175, Senate bill 1913.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1913) for the erection of a public building at Emporia, Kans.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert "or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise;" and in line 11, after the words "sum of," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices at the city of Emporia, Kans. The plans, specifications, and full estimates of said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $75,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PALMER. That may be informally laid aside.

Mr. INGALLS. According to the notice that I gave on Thursday last, I ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks upon the motion to refer the message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside for the purpose of taking for present consideration the resolution referred to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN December 19, 1887, to refer the message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, on the 11th day of January, 1888, a little less than four months ago, Maj. Gen. Fitz John Porter, now on the retired-list, wrote a letter from which I quote the following extract:

And now to you, one of the thousands of kind, generous friends, whose hearts I have felt, whose forms I have never seen nor warm hands touched, I beg to express my heartfelt appreciation of your kind acts in my behalf, and to assure you, all of you, North and South, that my heart is and always has been with you, though at one time my hand and head worked the best they knew against you and your cause, believing, as I did, it was for the best.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in the course of his observations last Wednesday complained with some bitterness that "a determined attempt was made during the war of the rebellion," and he added:

It has been continued since, to blacken the names of the great civil as well as military leaders who remained true to the Democratic party, as at enmity with the cause of the Union and in an alliance of sentiment at least with the Confederacy.

He also admitted, what never has been conceded hitherto, so far as I am advised, by any Democratic orator, that there is such a crime as treason, and that to be an ally of the Confederacy was to be a traitor. From his complaint at the accusations which he declared had been made, the irresistible inference was, first, that the implications against the civil and military leaders of the Democratic party as sympathizers with the South were not true; and next, that if they were true, they were discreditable and dishonorable.

Fitz John Porter was a military leader in the war for the Union who remained true to the Democratic party. He was dishonorably dismissed from the Army by the sentence of a court-martial, and many years after the war ended, at the close of a fierce struggle in Congress, was placed on the retired-list by the united support of the Democratic party, including many of its members who had been soldiers in the army of the Confederacy. It was claimed by his friends that he was a gallant warrior who had been sacrificed as a political victim, but he assures the Confederates in the letter which I have read that his heart was always with the South, although at one time his head and hand were against them and their cause. That even at that fatal crisis when his head and his hand were "working their best" for that brave Commander-General John Pope, whom the Senator from Indiana describes with somewhat of redundant and elaborate affluence of diction as a vain, pretentious, specious, boasting, and vain-glorious pretender—that even then his heart was, as it had always been and has ever since been, with Jeff. Davis, Lee, and Stonewall Jackson. And Fitz John Porter, like every other general who was suspected and distrusted by Lincoln and the Northern people, is canonized as a sainted patriot and hero by the Democratic party North and South. They know their friends.

Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan was another military leader who retained his allegiance to the Democratic party. Born in Pennsylvania and educated at West Point, he went immediately to New Orleans, where he became the intimate business associate and political friend of Beauregard, and allied himself actively with the schemes for the extension and perpetuation of human slavery by the acquisition of Cuba, being concerned in that filibustering enterprise with Albert Sidney Johnston, Gustavus W. Smith, Mansfield Lovell, and J. K. Duncan. He began his military career by disobeying the orders of General Scott. He abandoned Pope to the mercy of his foes at Centerville. He failed to put the rebels to the sword at Antietam and refused to obey the orders of the President of the United States to follow them to Winchester. He fatally controlled the destiny of the Army of the Potomac until the battle of Fredericksburgh, and was the intimate friend, associate, and companion of Maj. Gen. Fitz John Porter.

In the Peninsula campaign he commanded a magnificent host, which under Napoleon would have bivouacked in every Southern capital from Richmond to New Orleans. After the victory at Malvern Hills the order to retreat was denounced by Kearny and Hooker in terms that I will not repeat here, for I am not dealing with his military but with his political career.

History has pronounced its verdict upon him as a soldier, and the Senator from Indiana will strive in vain to place him in the category with Napoleon and Hannibal and Cæsar, even though he remained true to the Democratic party.

I deal with him as a Democratic politician, and I affirm that no man can read the insubordinate and insolent letter that he wrote to President Lincoln from the gunboat in the James River, to which he fled after the loss of 70,000 men in the disastrous seven days' fight before Richmond, without being forced to the conclusion that McClellan was not fully and actively in accord with the ideas and the convictions then animating those who supported the Union cause.

Here is the letter in part:

HARRISON'S LANDING, July 7, 1862.

MR. PRESIDENT: You have been fully informed that the rebel army is in the front with the purpose of overwhelming us by attacking our positions or reducing us by blocking our river communications. I can not but regard our condition as critical, and I earnestly desire, in view of possible contingencies, to lay before your excellency, for your private consideration, my general views concerning the existing state of the rebellion, although they do not strictly relate to the situation of this army or strictly come within the scope of my official duties. * * * The Union must be preserved. * * * The time has come when the Government must determine upon a civil and military policy covering the whole ground of our national trouble. * * * The responsibility of determining, declaring, and supporting such civil and military policy and of directing the whole course of national affairs in regard to the rebellion must now be assumed and exercised by you or our cause will be lost. The Constitution gives you power even for the present terrible exigency. * * *

The war shall be conducted on the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State in any event. * * * Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organization of States, or forcible abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a moment.

Unless the principles governing the future conduct of our struggle shall be made known and approved, the effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hopeless. A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

He desired to conduct the war so that the people of the South should not be subjugated, nor their property confiscated, nor treason punished, nor States conquered, nor slavery abolished, and in effect advised his army to disband if emancipation was proclaimed.

He was nominated for the Presidency in 1864 by the Democratic party upon a platform that contained the following declaration. It is ancient history, but a generation has arisen to whom it may be novel:

Resolved, That this convention does expressly declare as the sense of the American people that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, during which, under the pretense of a military necessity or war power higher than the Constitution, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every part, and public liberty and private right alike trodden down, and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired, justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities, etc.

His nomination for the Presidency was received by the rebel armies in their intrenchments with cheers, and by the newspapers of the Confederacy with approving enthusiasm. The Richmond Enquirer of September 8, 1864, said:

Every defeat of Lincoln's forces inures to the benefit of McClellan. The influence of the South, more powerful in the shock of battle than when throwing her minority vote in an electoral college, will be cast in favor of McClellan by this indirect yet efficacious means.

Upon the day after the election in the Confederate congress Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, declared:

I say we have friends—good, true, valiant friends at the North. Every vote given for McClellan was for peace. Every vote given for McClellan was a vote against Lincoln's African policy. Every vote given for McClellan was a vote given for an armistice. If McClellan had been elected, he, Foote, was prepared to make from his seat a proposition for a convention of the sovereign States, North and South, and he believed the South would have secured from it peace and her independence.

Mr. President, the election occurred in November. McClellan received 3 votes from the State of Delaware, 11 votes from the State of Kentucky, and 7 votes from the State of New Jersey, making 21 in all; and when Mr. Lincoln was elected he resigned his commission and passed into history as a military and civil leader who had remained true to the Democratic party.

Maj. Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock was born in Pennsylvania and educated at West Point. He was another of the military leaders that was true to the Democracy. His martial career is one of the imperishable heritages of American glory. He marched and he triumphed. He filled the abyss of fame with names that will be eternally luminous—the Peninsula, Antietam, Gettysburgh, Chancellorsville, Cold Harbor, and Petersburg. Had he been a soldier under Napoleon he would have been a prince and marshal of the empire. Undaunted in battle, resolute, with an indomitable passion for glory, he was the ideal corps commander, and was well named Hancock the Superb. When the war closed he enjoyed to a degree almost unknown in our history the affectionate admiration, gratitude, respect, and honor of the American people, irrespective of party.

But he, too, became tainted with the fatal virus of an ambition for the nomination for the Presidency by the Democratic party, and they voted for him in 1880, fifteen years after the war ended, not as the man who defeated, overwhelmed, and destroyed them at Gettysburgh and in the Wilderness, but as the author of Order No. 40 and the determined opponent of reconstruction in the fifth military district, comprising Louisiana and Texas. What were his duties as defined by the act of March 2, 1867? It was entitled:

An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States.

I quote so much of the preamble and of section 3 as will suffice to show his powers:

Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life and property now exist in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until legal and republican governments can be legally established: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said rebel States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States, as hereinafter prescribed, * * * Louisiana and Texas, the fifth district.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; * * * and all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void.

Those who were in sympathy with President Johnson in his effort to overthrow the reconstruction policy of Congress in the rebellious States were dissatisfied with Sheridan and the other great commanders who had preceded him, and they found in General Hancock a willing coadjutor.

The condition of affairs in the rebel States at this time is well described by General George H. Thomas, who commanded an adjacent district, and who was never suspected of partisanship or injustice. He says:

In localities where the disfranchised element is strong a spirit of persecution towards those in sympathy with the authorities, those who recognize the political rights of the enfranchised negroes, and the negroes themselves, especially shows itself in utter contempt of all respect for law. Violence is openly talked of. The editorials of the public press are such as to create the most intense hatred in the breasts of ex-rebels and their sympathizers. The effect of this is to cause disturbance * * * by inciting the ruffianly portion of this class of citizens to murder, rob, and maltreat white Unionists and colored people in localities where there are no United States troops stationed. The local authorities often have not the will, and more often have not the power, to suppress or prevent these outrages.

The colored people are quiet and peaceable; they have no political rights, not being enfranchised, yet ruffians are permitted to tyrannize over them, without fear of punishment. The testimony of negroes is refused in the State courts, and the United States courts are difficult of access to an ignorant people, without friends or influence. In some districts ex-Union soldiers are persecuted by their more numerous rebel neighbors, until they are forced into a resistance which sometimes ends with the loss of their lives, or they are compelled in self-defense to emigrate. An appeal to the courts affords but little hope for redress, as magistrates and juries too often decide in accordance with their prejudices, without regard to justice. The controlling cause of the unsettled condition of affairs in the department is that the greatest efforts made by the defeated insurgents since the close of the war have been to promulgate the idea that the cause of liberty, justice, humanity, equality, and all the calendar of the virtues of freedom suffered violence and wrong when the effort for Southern independence failed. This is, of course, intended as a species of political cant, whereby the crime of treason might be covered with a counterfeit varnish of patriotism, so that the precipitators of the rebellion might go down in history hand in hand with the defenders of the Government, thus wiping out with their own hands their own stains; a species of self-forgiveness amazing in its effrontery, when it is considered that life and property—justly forfeited by the laws of the country, of war, and of nations, through the magnanimity of the Government and people—was not exacted from them.

Under this inspiration the education of the great body of the people, moral, religious, and political, has been turned into channels wherein all might unite in common. The impoverishment of the South, resulting from war and its concomitants, the emancipation of slaves, and the consequent loss of substance, the ambiguity and uncertainty of political rights and financial values, as well as personal rivalries, have all combined to strengthen the efforts of pernicious teachers. The evil done has been great, and it is not discernable that an immediate improvement may be expected.

The reports of General Sheridan show that the situation in Louisiana and Texas was much worse even than that depicted by General Thomas, but General Hancock immediately upon assuming command issued his celebrated Order No. 40, prepared after consultation with the leaders of the Democratic party in Washington, written on his way down the river on a steamer, and promulgated before any opportunity to acquaint himself with the condition of affairs had occurred.

[General Orders No. 40.]

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, La., November 29, 1867.

I. In accordance with General Orders No. 81, headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's office, Washington, D. C., August 27, 1867, Maj. Gen. W. S. Hancock hereby assumes command of the fifth military district and of the department composed of the States of Louisiana and Texas.

II. The general commanding is gratified to learn that peace and quiet reign in this department. It will be his purpose to preserve this condition of things. As a means to this great end he regards the maintenance of the civil authorities in the faithful execution of the laws as the most efficient under existing circumstances.

In war it is indispensable to repel force by force and overthrow and destroy opposition to lawful authority. But when insurrectionary force has been overthrown and peace established, and the civil authorities are ready and willing to perform their duties, the military power should cease to lead and the civil administration resume its natural and rightful dominion. Solemnly impressed with these views, the general announces that the great principles of American liberty still are the lawful inheritance of this people, and ever should be. The right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, and the natural rights of persons and the rights of property must be preserved.

Free institutions, while they are essential to the prosperity and happiness of the people, always furnish the strongest inducements to peace and order. Crimes and offenses committed in this district must be referred to the consideration and judgment of the regular civil tribunals, and those tribunals will be supported in their lawful jurisdiction.

Should there be violations of existing laws which are not inquired into by the civil magistrates, or should failures in the administration of justice by the courts be complained of, the cases will be reported to these headquarters, when such orders will be made as may be deemed necessary.

While the general thus indicates his purpose to respect the liberties of the people, he wishes all to understand that armed insurrections or forcible resistance to the law will be instantly suppressed by arms.

By command of Maj. Gen. W. S. Hancock.

The results of this abdication of his powers and this renunciation of his duties under the reconstruction act are disclosed in the letter of Governor Pease to General Hancock, and the reply of the latter, which I will read as a contribution to the history of a military leader who remained "true to the Democratic party."

EXECUTIVE OF TEXAS,
Austin, Tex., January 17, 1868.

SIR: Your letter of the 28th of December, 1867, was received at this office on the 11th instant. I think it my duty to reply to some portions of it, lest my silence should be construed into an acquiescence in the opinions expressed therein in regard to the condition of Texas and the authority of the civil provisional government now existing here.

I dissent entirely from the declaration that "the State government of Texas, organized in subordination to the authority of the United States, is in full exercise of all its proper powers." The act of Congress "to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States" expressly declares in its preamble that no legal State government or adequate protection of life or property now exists in Texas, and it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said State until a loyal and republican State government can be legally established. It then provides that Texas shall be subject to the military authority of the United States, and shall constitute a part of the fifth military district. It also directs the President to assign to the command of that district an officer of the Army not below the rank of brigadier-general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority; and makes it the duty of such officer to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and try offenders; or when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose; and also declares that interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under said act shall be null and void.

This act further provides that until the people of Texas shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, any government that may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same.

The supplementary act of July 19, 1867, declares it to have been the true intent and meaning of the original act and the supplementary act of the 23d of March, 1867, that the government then existing in Texas was not a legal State government, and that thereafter said government, if continued, was to be continued subject in all respects to the military commander of the district, and the paramount authority of Congress.

The reasonable construction of these provisions of the act of Congress referred to would seem to be that Texas is placed under a military government, of which the chief officer is the commander of the fifth military district, and that whatever civil government there is in Texas is provisional only, subject to said military commander and the paramount authority of Congress, and exists only by their sufferance as a part of the machinery through which the military authority of the United States is exercised. This construction is supported by the acts of the successive commanders of the fifth military district, and their correspondence with this office from the time they first assumed command in March, 1867, until quite recently. They have exercised the right of removing and appointing at their pleasure the officers of this civil provisional government (with the exception of the few that are appointed by the governor), and of filling by appointments all vacancies in offices heretofore filled by an election by the people of Texas. They have also at pleasure exercised the right to abolish, modify, control, and supersede the laws heretofore enacted, as well as the proceedings and judgments of the courts. They have also, at their pleasure, made arrests for violations of the criminal laws. It is true that they have permitted the officers of this civil provisional government, except the legislature, to perform their duties as prescribed by the laws of Texas, but in subordination to their orders and the laws of the United States.

I am at a loss to understand how a government, without representation in Congress and without a militia force, with such limited powers, and thus subject to be further limited and changed at pleasure by the military commander of the district, can, with any propriety, be called a State government organized in subordination to the authority of the Government of the United States, and in full exercise of all its proper powers.

I also dissent from the declaration that "at this time the country is in a state of profound peace." Texas can not properly be said to be in a state of profound peace. It is true that there no longer exists here any organized resistance to the authority of the United States; but a large majority of the white population, who participated in the late rebellion, are embittered against the Government by their defeat in arms and loss of their slaves, and yield to it an unwilling obedience, only because they feel that they have no means to resist its authority. None of this class have any affection for the Government, and very few of them have any respect for it. They regard the legislation of Congress on the subject of reconstruction as unconstitutional and hostile to their interests, and consider the Government now existing here, under the authority of the United States, as a usurpation on their rights. They look upon the enfranchisement of their late slaves and the disfranchisement of a portion of their own class as an act of insult and oppression.

This state of feeling against the Government and its acts by a large majority of the white population, who have heretofore exercised the political power of Texas, combined with the demoralization and impatience of restraint by civil authority that always follows the close of great civil wars, renders it extremely difficult to enforce the criminal laws in those portions of the State which are most densely occupied, and often impossible to do so in those parts of the State which are sparsely settled. A knowledge of this state of affairs induces many to redress their fancied wrongs and grievances by acts of violence.

It is a lamentable fact that over one hundred cases of homicide have occurred in Texas within the last twelve months, while not one-tenth of the perpetrators have been arrested, and less than one-twentieth of them have been tried.

Within the last few months United States officers and soldiers have been killed while in the discharge of their duties, and in no case have those who committed these offenses been tried or punished. In these cases the most strenuous efforts were made by the military authorities to arrest the guilty parties, but without success, although they were well known.

It often happens that when the civil officers of a county are disposed to do their duty and endeavor to make arrests they are unable to do so because they are not properly sustained by the citizens of the county, and when arrests are made a large portion of the offenders escape from custody because there are no secure jails for their confinement, and the county authorities have not the means to pay for the proper guards. Several cases have come to my knowledge in which sheriffs failed entirely to arrest parties who had been indicted, although they remained in the county for months.

Grand juries often fail to find indictments when they ought to do so, and petit juries as often fail to convict offenders in cases where the evidence is conclusive. Hence it results that in many cases offenders escape punishment when the magistrates and sheriffs do their duty.
